No. 1323.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1865. TWO SHEETS, FIVEPENCE

THE DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

A DISSOLUTION of Parliament, when it is effected by mere lapse of time, calls public attention to the general principles on which the policy of the country has proceeded. An appeal to the constituent body necessitated by the defeat of the Government upon any particular question has this disadvantage, that it shuts out of view nearly the whole field of politics, with the exception of the one matter of urgency upon which an electoral decision is asked. That, happily, is not our case in the present instance. Seldom has it happened on a similar occasion that the question to be disposed of by the enfranchised classes was so wide in its scope, or so free from those surrounding influences which tend to envenom the contests of party. What is the present state of public affairs in the United Kingdom? To the operation of what causes may the existing condition of things be traced? What changes are needed, and how, and by whom, may they be best achieved? These are the broad problems which the predominant sense of the country is required to solve. We shall confine to the first of these questions the remarks we have to make. A rapid survey of the present situation is all that we shall attempt; for, when the occasion asks, as it does now, of the British people whither they would have the vessel of State steered, the first and most natural subject for consideration is, where is it now, in what direction has it been moving, and how far, therefore, is an alteration of the course desirable?

The Parliament just dismissed, whatever may have been its faults, has had the good fortune to pass off the stage at a moment of profound peace, of unusual contentment, of singular prosperity. Much of this gratifying result, no doubt, is the effect of causes for which the late Parliament can take no credit, and a fair proportion of it is due to causes which no Parliament could control. Still, the popular mind, never very nice in its discrimination, but not often essentially unjust, is ready enough to connect together a progressively satisfactory condition of public affairs with wise and beneficial legislation, and a prevalence of gloom and discontent with the contrary. How far the financial, the commercial, the social, and the international improvement, in which all parties alike rejoice, is owing to Ministerial guidance and secretarial wisdom we leave to be determined by future historians, who will see the relative proportions of things much more clearly than it is possible for us to do. But the immediate influence which this sunshine will be sure to have upon the temper of electors in general must be reckoned as a piece of good luck, to say the least, as it regards the political reputation of the defunct body. It will undoubtedly moderate the tone of the constituencies. It will go far towards disarming criticism of the more trenchant writers. It will encourage placability of disposition. It will beget disinclination to violent changes. The voice of the country will be calm, and its resolution temperate. But then it will also effect general rather than incidental issues, and, on the whole, will perhaps settle for a longer time to come the direction of national policy, both at home and abroad, than has happened when Parliament was dissolved in stormier seasons.

The Parliament elected in 1859 has come upon its high functions at a period of great anxiety concerning our foreign relations, and throughout its entire course was compelled to deal with questions upon their treatment of which dependent the continuance of peace. The Italian war, the Polish insurrection, the Dano-German war, and the terrible civil struggle in the United States tested, in many ways, the diplomatic skill of the Government and the judgment and forbearance of the House of Commons. So difficult and delicate, indeed, were few people thought it possible for us to escape the overhanging tempest. What is now our position? Tranquillity reigns undisturbed and supreme. The clouds have rolled away. The political heavens are bright. Not a cloud flecks the sky—not even "a little cloud no bigger than a man's hand." Look wheresoever we will there is not only peace but every reasonable prospect of its endurance. Continental Europe presents no international questions calculated to engender any feeling of distrust. In America, while much remains to try the capacity of Transatlantic statesmanship, nothing is visible from which to infer danger of hostility between the two great families of the Anglo-Saxon race. China gives us no cause of uneasiness. Japan, for the time being, suppresses her dislike of foreigners. We have not even an Abyssinian war on our hands; and the insurrection in New Zealand is at a temporary standstill. The contrast between the state of things at the opening and at the close of the late Parliament is most marked. It may be, as some affirm, that the Legislature had little or nothing to do in bringing about this result, and that, had it never met, things would have taken pretty nearly the same course. The consistencies, however, will be very likely to reflect that "the end crowns the work," and that, although the wisdom and keen vigilance of the power of Parliament to do much positive good, it might, if it had been so disposed, have done enormous evil. The highest wisdom and the purest patriotism will sometimes most conspicuously show themselves in a wise reticence. The power when not to stir is often as valuable a qualification as to know when and how to move. At any rate, it will be remembered of the House of Commons just expired that it advanced through a period of explosive agencies without permitting a single trophe, and that before it ceased to be all cause for apprehension had vanished.

If we look to domestic affairs, they exhibit a similarly smiling aspect. In all the phases of material prosperity the country is making manifest progress. It is waxing enormously rich. Peace, prudence, industry, and the bounty of Providence, have combined to diffuse affluence over a wide surface of society, comfort over a still wider. There never has been, in this kingdom, a time of greater plenty, greater enterprise and activity, or greater contentment. The fatness of our trade almost suffocates our politics. Two or three abundant harvests succeed to the scarcity of 1860-61, and they not only make these the sudden and protracted failure of employment in Lancashire and Cheshire occasioned by the cessation for a time of the supply of cotton, the diminution of trade caused by the American war, the uncertainty of prospects on the Continent, which for a considerable period paralysed commercial activity, and the high price of money more than once. In spite of all these drawbacks the country has prospered, the revenue has kept up to its normal level, and every great capital have reaped a fair reward, and the people have displayed no sign of either dissatisfaction or disloyalty. This state of things was prevalent during the greater part of the late Parliament, which, at any rate, passed several financial and economical measures intended and calculated to promote it. The Commercial Treaty with France, out of which have come similar treaties with other Continental Powers; the relief ministered to trade by the reduction of taxation; and the abrogation of several old restrictions upon the freedom of labour and of exchange, have unquestionably contributed in no small degree to the general well-being of the country.

Our colonies and dependencies exhibit much the same features. They have most of them been acquiring wealth with remarkable steadiness—some of them with great rapidity, and all of them value their connection with the mother country. At the present moment not a whisper of dissatisfaction is to be heard from any of them, which, indeed, is not strange, seeing that they have been mostly left to manage their own affairs and have received from home little besides paternage, protection, and pecuniary aid. Taking the entire empire, it must be admitted that the Parliament of 1859-65 has left it in a flourishing condition. It might have been done better than it has been done no doubt; but on a broad estimate of the whole case, the country will be disposed to consider that it cannot have done much amiss, so far as its material interests have been affected. In relation to speculative and party politics it may have a less gratifying account to render to its constituent bodies. But these are topics with which we do not intermeddle. We leave them to the electors of the United Kingdom, who, we are convinced, in choosing a new representative assembly, will not forget the tranquillity, abundance, and popular contentment which, in some measure, at least, flowed from the legislation of the Parliament now defunct.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

M. Drouyn de Lhuys, Earl Cowley, and the Dutch and Belgian Ministers, on Wednesday, exchanged the ratifications of the Paris convention, concluded on Nov. 8, 1864, which will come into operation on the 1st of August.

Abd-el-Kader arrived at Marseilles on Thursday.

Upon the Budget being brought forward on Tuesday, in the Senate, Baron Dupin maintained the right of the Senate to discuss it. The President remarked that he regretted that the Senate could only exercise its constitutionality. The proposal of Baron Dupin would, he said, tend to transform the Senate into a Chamber of Peers. Baron Dupin replied that he considered that would be to perfect the Constitution. The President observed that a senatus consultum could alone perfect the Constitution. The Senate subsequently approved the general question of the Budget.

In the Corps Législatif, yesterday week, it was decided that the Universal Exhibition building should be erected in the Champ de Mars. On Saturday last, a message was brought from the Emperor, M. Baroche, necessity for a new loan was admitted by the Chamber, upon the Government entering into an engagement to receive the instalments of the loan in four years, although the loan for 250,000,000*l.* would be issued in a single year. The law for the loan to be raised in the city of Paris was passed by 170 to 50 votes—the exception of the Opposition being headed by Lares. The relative to the execution of new public works in Algeria was opposed, on Monday, by M. Picard, and supported by M. Jerome David. It was finally adopted by 222 votes to 31. The Senate, on Tuesday, by a majority of closed on Monday evening, after the adoption of bills relating to the Paris fortifications, mechanical inventions, and to railways, the effect of which certain questions of local interest were discussed. The Vice-President, M. Schneider, in his farewell address to the Chamber, said he would probably re-assemble early in January next. He pointed out the important public works completed during the session, the prosperity, and the liberty of the debates, "in which," he added, "political controversies have been largely mixed. Far be it from me to complain of this, since these controversies respond to that which occupies the public mind and enlightens the nation. They cannot but strengthen the Government such as that of the Emperor."

Marshal M'Mahon has received one of the two gold medals bestowed by the Prince Consort on the successful exhibitors and contributors of the "Exhibition" of Cologne, as being "a great encourager of Agriculture."

Rosa Bonheur has been commissioned to paint the portrait of Madame for the Empress's private gallery.

The prize founded by M. de Humboldt for the best work on musical science has been adjudged to Signor Lauderdale des Lauriers, to M. J. Evans, for his work, "The Ancient Coins of Britain: Lond., 1864." Falconer Atlee, Esq., Queen's Advocate, will proceed to her Majesty's Embassy, has been appointed also our Consul at Paris.

Count Paolo has had an interview with M. Drouyn de Lhuys.

A fête was given in the Champs Elysées, July 4, in honour of Catalan, by Mr. Bigelow, the American Ambassador, in celebration of the anniversary of American Independence. Mr. Bigelow delivered a speech, in which he stated the conciliatory ideas entertained by his Government. Mr. Seward, he said, was the most conciliatory of the statesmen of American flags. In the evening there were fireworks, and among the several devices were Lafayette and Washington on horseback side by side, and the spread eagle with the motto, "The Union, now and for ever one and inseparable."

The ceremony of laying the first stone of the English Protestant Church at St. Peter's, at Chantilly, has recently taken place, in the presence of nearly the whole English congregation and a large number of the French inhabitants. The inclosure was decorated with flags, and in the centre, under the usual cloth, was placed a stone in white, formed a pleasing circle round the platform. After a prayer by the Rev. Mr. Cazenove, performing a service in French, one of the proprietors of the domain, placed a notice of the ceremony, written on parchment, in a cavity of the stone, and the cloth was then lifted and then, laying this latter upon its bed, addressed a few appropriate words to the assembled crowd. A special evening service, which was very fully attended, concluded the day's proceedings. The church is intended principally for Dieppe service early in 1866. The English residents have subscribed liberally, and the proprietors of the domain, in addition to the site, have given 20,000*f.*

A commercial traveller in Paris has brought an action against Baron Nathaniel Rothschild for injuries received in stopping his runaway horses and carriage. Damages were laid at 2,000*l.* and £200 were awarded.

SPAIN.

The Queen and the Court left Madrid, on Saturday evening, for the Royal palace at San Ildefonso.

The Cortes have voted the Budgets for the Ministries of War, the Marine, the Interior, and the Colonies.

AUSTRIA.

The Emperor returned to Vienna, on Sunday, from Ischl. His Majesty gave audience to Count Mensdorff, Baron Schmerling, and Count Belcredi.

In military circles at Vienna it is positively asserted that a Cabinet order has been issued to place the entire army on a peace footing. It is also stated that proposals are entertained for other reductions of the public expenditure.

All the reductions in the War and Naval Budgets passed by the Lower House have been approved by the Finance Committee of the Upper House.

The semi-official papers published at Agram deny the report that the Ban Jellachich intended to convoke a Diet at Agram, and that it had been merged into one. They also contradict the rumour that the Ministerial Council at Vienna had caused a change in the relations of Croatia to Hungary and to the whole monarchy.

UNITED STATES.

The blockade of all United States ports, including Galveston, has been raised, and ships are now open to foreign commerce.

Mr. Seward has announced that, in consequence of England not absolutely withdrawing her belligerent rights, the Alabama vessels will not pay the customary courtesies to vessels of the British flag. Mr. Seward has instructed Mr. Dudley, Treasury agent, to seize all of rebel cruisers, and claims the right to capture them under whatever flag they may be sailing.

President Johnson has appointed Andrew Hamilton of Texas, James Johnson of Georgia, and Lewis E. Parsons of Alabama Provisional Governors of those States, in accordance with the programme adopted by the Cabinet on the 9th ult.

Immense numbers of negroes, past work, have been expelled from the cities of Georgia. Great mortality prevails among the negroes in Charleston.

Provisional Governor Holden, of North Carolina, has issued a proclamation calling a Convention to amend the State Constitution, to elect a Governor and Legislature, and to restore the complete rule of civil law. He has also called upon the citizens of the people to become loyal, good, and useful citizens. He officially announces to the coloured people their freedom, and hopes they will become industrious, as otherwise their race cannot escape extinction. He promises to by their friend if they do right, but declares that he will aid in enforcing prompt punishment upon the idle and vicious.

The message of the Governor to the Virginia Legislature urges the avoidance of all legislation calculated unnecessarily to irritate the people. He recommends fewer restrictions in the regulation of the white elective franchise. As neither himself nor the Legislature has the control of the negro suffrage, they will not deliberate on that question. An extra Session of the Virginia Legislature was convened on the 19th ult. at Richmond.

The Governor of Tennessee has ordered the election of a full Congressional delegation.

Orders have been issued to dismantle the defensive works around Washington, except twenty-two forts and three batteries, which are to be strengthened and permanently garrisoned.

The Government had ordered a further reduction of the army by 50,000 men.

The 23 per cent restriction duty on cotton west of the Mississippi had been removed.

The country is now divided into five grand military divisions—the Atlantic, under General Meade; the Mississippi, under General Sherman; the Pacific, under General Halleck; the South-west, under General Sheridan; and the Pacific, under General Halleck.

The grand jury at San Francisco has dismissed the complaint against the parties charged with having been engaged in expedition to Mexico.

Mr. Breckenridge and six others reached Cuba, on the 11th ult., from the Bahamas, in which latter place they now are.

Mrs. Lincoln has taken up her residence, for the summer, at Hyde Park, Illinois, 12 miles from Chicago.

Mrs. Seward, wife of Secretary Seward, has died of bilious fever, at Washington.

A delegation of Poles has had an interview with President Johnson. They say that the Polish exiles in the United States, and in America, efforts are being made to get them to settle in Virginia.

The grand jury at Washington, for the defence, in the conspiracy trials, was continued before the military court in Washington on the 21st ult. Mr. Bradley, counsel for Payne and Atzerot, admitted the guilt of Payne, but urged the Court to consider how far his punishment should be mitigated on account of his manifest conviction that he was acting in obedience to and supporting a lawful Act. Payne had, by reason of his Southern education, his participation at a tender age in the war, and by his obedience in district wherein the Secretary of War caused great devastation and suffering, become a deadly enemy to the North. He had consequently regarded Mr. Lincoln as a tyrant and usurper, and Mr. Seward as a mortal enemy to the South and her institutions. He had therefore believed himself right in attempting to take life. The accused was, in his guilt, only a consequence of the evil influence of others, and was no blood lust, but a fanatic, and an enthusiast, and a hero. Apart from his crime, which he (Mr. Doster) deplored, he was moral in Payne's character to admire. Mr. Doster strongly urged the Court to consider the extreme youthfulness of the case before pronouncing sentence, although the prisoner deemed it his duty to die, and he (Mr. Doster) did not think he suffered any pain in crown of martyrdom.

On the following day, Mr. Doster claimed that the prisoner had, although at first he considered Booth's propositions, finally shrunk from participating in the conspiracy, and had endeavoured to arrange a save-of-expiation therein to escape Booth's indignation.

The defence was then concluded by Mr. Aiken in behalf of Mr. Surratt, and the Court adjourned. In consequence of her serious illness, Mrs. Surratt's counsel asked from her cell to more comfortable quarters in the penitentiary.

Mr. Bevens-Davis has submitted an argument denying the jurisdiction of the military courts for the conspirators.

AUSTRALIA.

MELBOURNE, April 26.

Australia is commonly supposed to resemble the mother country much in the same way as New York reminded Mark Tapley's friend of the village he was living to owing to extremely small. The Melbourne men, women, children, dogs, cats, and so on, with the tenacity of purpose for which the Britons are famous, have taken decisive steps in there certainly is a difference. It is not that where you are Englishmen are not, but that everything is wanted in Melbourne—only partially browned. Facing the Atlantic Ocean, after the second day of hot wind, the grass in the gardens and parks have shivered and set after sweltering at noon. But this last month, certainly, our disease has been a fever, and a certain Emperor ordained, "Fevers, free us from freezing to perspiration, and vice versâ, at an hour's notice. Yet few people die of fever in Melbourne, though we have no sewerage and much drunkenness, and that drunkenness upon the basis of the most objectionable compounds that human cupidity has ever hatched. Our water is not bad, with all deference—we are so wonderfully well fed. It is astonishing what a man can do in the way of living to earn a shilling when he has enough of fresh air. Though not practically built upon seven hills, Melbourne is a very up and down place, and since the railways have come to a standstill, the people live further and further away, so that it is causing no little stir in the Melbourne mind that we have with us 140,000 inhabitants, as from London with its 3,000,000. The chief difference is in the latter case, the gardens—acres are rare, where a Londoner would have half a rood—and in the flowers, and last, not least, in the trees. In the spring, when the hawthorn is in bloom, and when it rises are in bushes; the vines—which we have, and you have not—grow so luxuriantly that the tired wayfarer may find a shelter from the sun's rays, and the hot-weather-beaten green sward on which the pretty girls play croquet and the fat babies tumble about—we have it not, and never shall have it, despite a sheet of water in the very great glory of Melbourne, the Yan Yean, which inundates us with water. As Mr. Wyller reminded of the lukewarmness of ladies, "Never has otherwise provided."

It is not very wonderful that, with a population like ours, where, in honest truth, every man who chooses can earn a day's comfort by three hours' work, the Protection cry should drop a very slow length along. It never would have been started at all had not Melbourne, like Sydney, been a great overgrown head to a disproportionately small body. These Australian capitals are, like tadpoles, all head, All those whom we call "leaders" hang on to the capital like grim death. They regard it as a veritable Tom Tiddler's ground, and hence the streets are crowded with heavy, lounging lookers-on, waiting for the fortune which never will come. These men—quarter tillers, quarter shearmakers, half something else—almost forget shearing, and as for the strength of standing upon two legs they have all votes, they are able to raise a duet (we Australians say as "corroboree—see how we are corrupting the language). But the days evenness in south Victoria at least, the signs of the times notwithstanding, will always be a favourable country.

Meantime the city, as a city, benefites itself every day. Dedotting Lesson, Constantinople, and other such locations, which Nature seems to have bent her mind upon making melodramatically beautiful, perhaps Gilbert's has. Melbourne has a way of running round or being a street of streets. The ground descends regularly along a gentle slope, and it is a wide and roomy street, with a fine, cheerful atmosphere, every church and house and almost every individual is remodel. It is on, as we, imperfect, Bull-mall, open space, and we are never such a sky as Pall-mall, alas! can never realise. At the head of the eastern rise is the statue of Burke and Wills, the explorers, which, having just been unveiled, stands by Exhibition Street, and is nearly in the presence of many thousands of people, on the 21st inst. The monument is considerably to the left of Exhibition Street; it is near Swan one end to the other; and, as a work of art, it reflects the highest credit upon the sculptor, Mr. Charles Summers. The figure of Burke, the taller of the two, stands 13 ft. high; and the whole group is cast, in one piece, in bronze, and weighs about 7 tons. The ceremony declared in his speech on the occasion, even effected by any artist.

In close connection with the subject of the Burke and Wills' monument is a movement of another kind, which is awakening a deep interest in Australia generally; and, being cosmopolitan, I earnestly recommend it to the attention of yourself and your readers. The people of the Australian explorer, little noticed compared with that of others, or of the unexplored Australia. After his return from one of his successes; but both the hot and the dry are constant, and anyone who goes into either knows what he has to expect. The explorer may die as it may be, either a Sahara or a deluge. The explorer may have one year to rain, when, again, he may have to see not a drop of water. The heat is normally ferocious—there is no better word for it. Into this wilderness, sometimes with too much water, pushed, in the unlucky year 1848, Leichhardt, the great explorer; and there he vanished. His previous successes had led to no great risk; no one doubted of his safety till two years had elapsed; but, with Australians, two years are as fifty years in Europe. Leichhardt seemed to be forgotten. After him came Kennedy, but not by the faithful few. At last the lines of his route have turned up; they have passed five hundred miles of the most inhospitable west coast of the former explorers, and then turned eastward into a region but as long as Europe, and which is all one wilderness, or a Golconda, for anything we know; and there, perhaps, he is, or at least some of his party are, and a very great effort is being made by a very few energetic afterents in Melbourne to start a new expedition, by the help of camels and tractes, and discover both the fallen hero and the new land he has penetrated. We have, however, spilt money in Victoria on the Burke and Wills' monument so heavily, that it is not very much, that the nearly sum (ten thousand pounds) will come in in very small sixteens.

Among the measures at present before Parliament is a bill to amend the Post Office Act. The chief object of the measure is to establish post-office savings' banks. Already there are fifty-five post offices, in connection with the savings' banks now established in various districts. Deposits of sixpence and upwards will be received, and interest will be allowed at the rate of 2 per cent per annum.

According to a return laid before Parliament a few weeks ago, the members of the Victorian Volunteer force numbered, on the 1st of January, 8,000. The total expenditure during the year 1884-85 was £80,000 had exhilled as effectives.

That enthusiastic work of the modern German drama, Hahn's "Gladiator of Ravenna," so much spoken of and so little known, seems doomed to meet with many difficulties in getting on the stage. For some reason unexplained, the author Munch von Bellinghausen declines to send a word to the pleuse of the public. The work of this distinguished dramatist sent this play anonymously to the Imperial Theatre of Vienna where it was produced in October, 1854, and immediately aroused national enthusiasm, and won, as it deserved, all sorts of rumours were, of course, immediately in circulation concerning the great dramatic unknown; and in the columns of the Vienna Printers' type, however, soon settled the question, and it required no critical penetration to decide between the genuine dramatic instinct and the dramatic genius and poetry of Hahn, in whose collected works the "Gladiator" forms a German play, perhaps the most remarkable and often spoken of by the critical journals as a fortrate play, alike for the study and the stage, the work has never exult the English heaps. Some time ago, two years ago, Mr. Wilkie Collins, the well-known journalist here, translated it for Drury Lane Theatre; but, through some of the vicissitudes of theatrical business, the piece was withdrawn. It has been reserved for Melbourne to introduce this fine work to a British public, and I rumour is to be produced at the Theatre Royal versions. The story goes that a Miss Cleveland, who obtained some popularity here about a year ago by a performance in Sardou's famous character of Leah was shown and became enamoured with Hahn's heroine, and would, accordingly making an arrangement with some German Princess, Thuesela. The story, then, seems to be this, that the actress learned the German original, and, with the services of a local author, produced another version. Powell and Bandmann, it is said, appeal, Mr. Jaffray, in self defence, took the play to the Royal, the manager of which was not slow to recognise the merits of it, and has been announced for performance at that establishment at an early date. From paragraphs published in the local press it appears that the public expect great things from this play, and the resources of the Royal is commensurate with its position. The part of Hahn has been sent to England (whither, I believe, he will himself shortly go), and will, no doubt, soon have the honour of being produced.

Parliament being in recess on account of the Easter holidays, there is little news to report. We have had a very dry season, which is telling upon all interests—mining, agricultural, and pastoral. Yesterday, however, rain set in, with every appearance of continuing.

Business has recently received a check from the failure of the notorious desperado, Morgan, who for two years has roughs-shod over the colony of New South Wales, in the exercise of his nefarious profession. Single-handed he would "stick up" house after house, murdering and plundering right and left. Many are the unpunished crimes laid to his charge. Latterly he got so defiant that he concluded that Victoria was too hot to hold him, and crossed over to the border, and came into Victoria, asserting, in his bookfardness, that in our wide land we had room enough for each one of us to live in. On the third day after entering upon Victorian ground, he stuck up a household of people in a township called Wangaratta. One or two of the servants got outside, and communicated the tillings that Morgan was within. The police were sent for, volunteers came forward, and the dwelling was surrounded. After keeping the occupants of the house in one room all night, and expressing his intention of remaining there permanently, to the amusement, Morgan took his departure at nine o'clock in the morning, preceded by a dozen or four naked blacks, and accompanied by whom he followed with revolver in hand. Whilst thus marching to the paddock, from which he intended taking a horse, he was shot dead by the men in ambush, one of whom fired and killed him on the spot. The news was immediately telegraphed to the chief constable in Melbourne the excitement, which ran high, was fed by the publication of second and third editions of our solitary penny print, with startling headings in large-sized type, after the manner of genuine Yankeedom. Now, after it is all over, of course, comparisons are instituted between the conduct of the people of the two colonies towards the bushrangers, how, this villain was shot down on the third day after his invasion of our territory, whereas in the sister colony, for two years and more, he did what he liked, setting both police and people at defiance. A coroner's jury has returned a verdict of "Justifiable homicide."

Through an accident to the machinery of the Madras, the English mails this month did not reach Melbourne till the 20th inst., or seven days behind contract time. The other colonies, with the exception of South Australia, will feel the effect of this delay more than we shall, as they will thereby be precluded from the advantages of replying by return of post. However, the delay and the consequent vexation will doubtless have the effect of hastening what we all so much desire—fortnightly communication with the mother country.

The northern part of South Australia is suffering from want of water. The runs there are literally parched up. Sheep and cattle have been dying in great numbers. On Yorke Peninsula, too, there are great complaints of want of water. Its price had been one shilling the hundredful, and even at this rate it was extremely valuable. The winter rains were being looked forward to with much anxiety. The harvest throughout the colony is reported to be very good. The total harvest to have been 4,250,863 bushels of wheat, or 11 bushels per acre, against 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 bushels during the previous year. The Parliament had adjourned for a three weeks' holiday. On its re-assembling, a vote of £40,000 will be brought forward.

During the month, a considerable amount of business had been got through in both Houses of Parliament in New South Wales. The session has been a very long one, extending over three years approaching a final stage, and a disposition had been evinced on the part of the Government to bring it to a conclusion. Many important questions of greater urgency, particularly in their proposals for placing the finances of the colony on a satisfactory footing. The only questions that have been brought before the Assembly have occasioned prolonged discussion, and it is probable that the Session should be a short one did not seem likely to be reached.

The Land Appropriation Bill has passed through both Houses, and has been assented to by the Governor. The bill provides for the sale, leasing of the Crown lands, and for the punishment of those who afford them success or assistance in their illegal occupation. It seeks to take away peasen's licences or ammunition when in pursuit of the bushrangers. The Government proposal to grant a pension both in the Council and in the Assembly. It was disapproved of as a violation of constitutional principles, and as a dangerous precedent in promoting the capture of the bushrangers; and it was urged that, while rewards for the capture of bushrangers were proper, they should be offered and rendered more efficient. Shortly after the passing of the bill, the Governor issued a proclamation offering three of the most notorious bushrangers; and, informations having been filed by the Attorney-General in the Supreme Court, a summons was issued by the Chief Justice requiring the accused to appear—these proceedings being required by the Act, as preliminary to the outlawry of the bushrangers.

The Sydney Mint bill—making permanent provision for the establishment of the Royal Mint—has been passed by both Houses of Parliament. The object of the measure is to enable the gold coin of New South Wales to be of legal tender throughout the Empire. Another which concession has been promised by the Home Government upon proper representations being made by the Colonial Office. In the course of the debate on the second reading of the bill in the Assembly doubts were expressed as to the propriety of the Sydney sovereigns having a currency in England, as, being of greater intrinsic value than the English sovereigns, they were, on reaching London, melted and transmitted to the Bank of England in bullion.

DISCOVERY OF PETER THE GREAT'S REAL POLITICAL TESTAMENT

THE last number of the Archives for the History of Saxony contains an extremely important article by Professor Schmidt, which is referred to by Peter the Great's political testament, and which contains a plan for the subjugation of Europe, and especially of Germany, by Russia. The article, which is entitled "Peter the Great's Political Testament," is given in full in the original French. It was discovered by Professor Schmidt in 1847, that Peter the Great really did leave a political testament, but that it was not the one which had been published, and the document which he put forward at the time was a forgery.

From the diplomatic reports of Herr von Pussel, now first discovered, it appears that Peter the Great's real political testament was delivered in 1717, a Privy Council, presided over by the Empress Anna, was held at St. Petersburg, at which Count Andrei Ostermann, Russian Vice-Chancellor, Minister of the Czar, attended to certain political instructions left by the Emperor Peter the Great. These instructions, which were written in cipher, consisted of a letter addressed to the Czar's death, by Makowejew, his secretary, and of a memorandum in the Czar's own handwriting. Count Bitter, the Empress's favourite, then present, communicated its contents confidentially to Herr von Pussel, the Saxon Plenipotentiary, who wrote a report upon the subject to the Saxon Government. Count Vitzthum, Saxon Minister at the Court of Dresden, has published this report in 1879 (Art. II., Vol. I., Stuttgart), and publishes very important extracts from it in the above magazine.

The following are the leading points in the plan that Poland is to be pursued by Russia towards Poland, and which are in direct contradiction with Art. II. of the Treaty of Vienna, by which Russia guaranteed to the Kingdom—

"Perfectly good friendship must at all times be kept up in Russia with Poland, and no opportunity be looked upon as so favourable as to want to gain possession thereof by force of arms. Poland is to be left to the free, unfavoured, and well-peopled country, we must be more avoid driving her to dependence by the use of violence, and letting her think that she has become Russia, on the other hand, is not so populated, but is just as much exhausted.

"It would, however, be necessary to keep a close watch that Austria never would take in the conservation of the Poles, she herself, in case of necessity, would serve the Poles as a bulwark against Russia. The Polish nobles would stand ready to give help; and it would be just as easy for the former, by attaining the Imperial dignity, to subjugate Poland. This would have with effect as it would otherwise be difficult.

"Russia has also to take care that Poland remains in her present shape, and the means to that end are mainly these:—Followers of the Greek rite in Poland are never to be oppressed . . . . Commissioners of the Russian armies is most carefully to be avoided; and by the grant of certain pensions among the nobility, and by the use of the cause of Russia, whenever this was most respected, in order, with their help, to be able to advance or counteract, as the circumstances may require, the Diets.

"Further, Russia must establish a close and secret understanding with the King of Poland, especially in his character of Elector of Saxony. In this way possibly the Elector of Saxony would be induced to take the part of the Saxons advanced before Riga after the action at Narva, which terminated so disastrously for the Swedes, and would thus be induced to move thither and divert the whole thereon held to Poland, all ways of recovering herself would have been lost.

"It is now seen that the King of Prussia constantly lays by more money and collects troops, and that he is on the point of making himself master of Saxony, and that he is on the point of making himself master of Saxony, and one and the same interest with Russia to keep a watchful eye upon his neighbours, whose dispositions are not to be trusted. Russia must, therefore, on the same making any new conquests, in order therefore to anticipate the Prussian designs, and to be able to counteract them, and to keep up a close understanding with the Electoral house of Saxony."

We have reason to believe that the Great Seal has been offered to and accepted by Lord Cranworth.—Globe of Thursday.

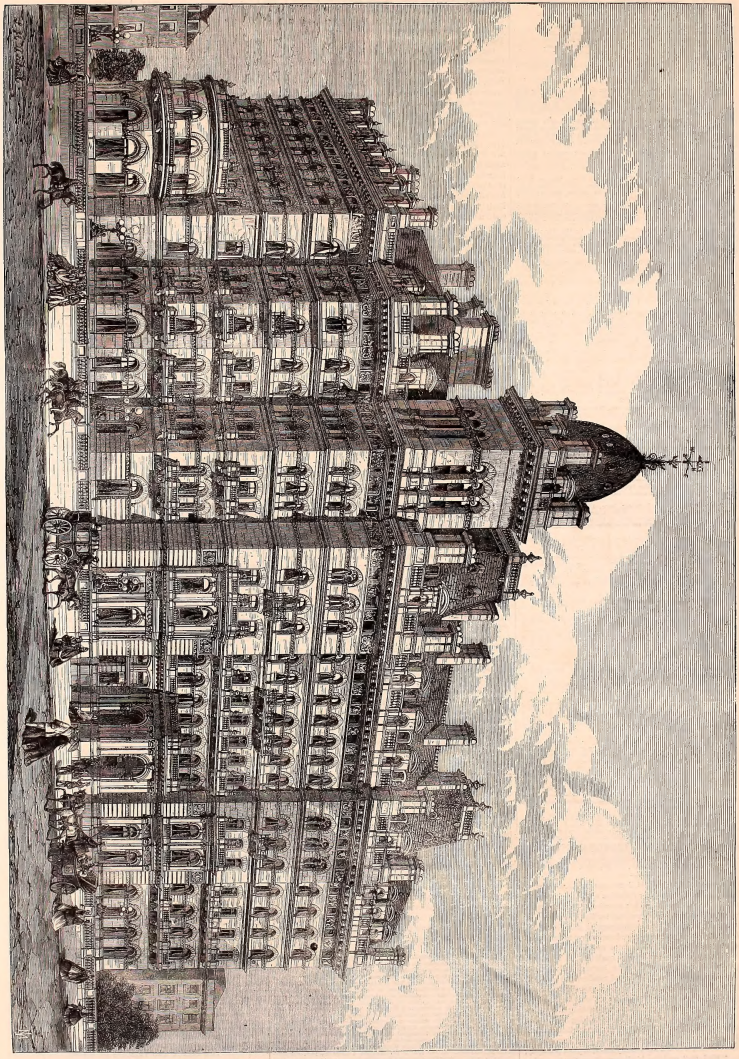
Letters received from Constantinople to the 28th ult. state that the Grand Vizier, Rustem Pasha, was seized with an attack of danger. The Pasha of Egypt had been received with great honours. It is reported that the Sultan will confer upon him the rank of Generalissimo of the armies of the Ottoman Empire.

Havannah advices announce the arrival of General John C. Breckenridge in Cuba, after an adventurous voyage, in company with six other persons, in a small sailing vessel from the coast of Florida. Persons paying General Breckenridge were Colonel Wilson, an aid to Jefferson Davis, Captain Hood, Mr. Wood, Mr. Breckenridge, and Mr. Ewing, a nephew of General Sherman. Mr. Ewing, who was a Federal officer, left Cuba when he refused to leave his master. General Breckenridge and Colonel Wilson were within forty miles of Havannah when they were seized by the Spanish. He was actually with him, but succeeded in making his escape, and on the following day reached the residence of the planter, and was conducted towards the coast. Crossing Georgia into Florida they descended the St. John's River, and on the 14th ult. reached the coast. Here they found a Federal steamer, from whom they secured a letter boat, which they sailed down the river to the mouth, and put to sea. Head winds prevailed, and the little party launched their boat. They had a narrow escape from being run down by a large steamer, which passed so close that the small boat was tossed about quite miles from the point of departure, in order to beat shillfish, which, with Indian corn, constituted their sole food on the voyage. A Federal steam-transport came in sight, and a boat put off towards the reef. Captain Hood and the two privates met the boat, some distance from the reef, and succeeded in convincing the officer in charge that the party consisted of paroled soldiers, who were looking down the coast for old wrecks, and they were left unmolested. After a voyage of three, or, according to some accounts, eight days, involving great exposure and privation, they reached Cardenas, on June 11. They were very kindly received by the people, and the authorities furnished them transportation to Havannah. General Breckenridge, Colonel Wilson, Captain Hood, Mr. Breckenridge, Breckenridge to the Captain-General of the island, who received him with cordial hospitality and great courtesy, and to that General, his aid-de-camp replied in the friend.

TELEGRAPH MAP OF THE EASTERN WORLD.

IT has been the practice of some modern geographers to divide this terraqueous globe, which we call the world, into the Eastern and the Western Hemispheres—the latter designation including the New World and South American continent, with the neighbouring islands; while the former includes not only Europe, Asia, and Africa, some parts of which were known to the ancients, but likewise the vast island or continent of Australia, with the Australasian and several Polynesian groups of smaller islands discovered more lately than America itself. In modern times, the art of navigating the Ship or Sea has improved to show the progress of telegraphic communication from England in the direction of the Antipodes. The first Telegraph Company in Australia may be styled a Telegraph Map of the Eastern World, but not of the Old World exclusively, since the youthful communities of the Melbourne, Hong-Kong and Singapore, with others of recent birth, constitute a New World much newer than that of the American continent. But in every case the progress of English commerce and colonisation in those distant regions, as well as to the political and military engineering of the Government at home, the prosperity of the East India Company was superseded by the direct rule of Queen Victoria after the mutiny of the Bengal native army, and the renewed energy of transmission of messages between London and the remotest of the British provinces in the East, have all the correspondent urgency for a telegraphic system embracing half the circumference of the earth. At the same time the practicability of such a project, which was proved by actual experiment in 1858, is now in process of final completion, linking the Eastern Hemisphere, or at least the whole of North America, so far as it is inhabited by people of English race, by submarine telegraphic communication with this country. We trust, in a few days or weeks, to be enabled to announce the successful issue of that gigantic enterprise, having already made our arrangements for providing a new map of the Eastern World, in addition from the pencil of an eminent artist who goes on board the Great Eastern to depict the most remarkable incidents of the expedition, from the Atlantic Telegraph Cable from Valentia to Newfoundland. The westward extension of telegraphy over the Pacific Ocean, just on the occasion we are looking eastward, and the present Number of our Journal, containing several Illustrations of the laying of the Indo-European Telegraph Cable in the Persian Gulf, commemorates an achievement which is second only to that of placing the wire-rope of international converse in the depths of the Atlantic Ocean. Indeed, as regards the fact, it is not denied that the construction of submarine telegraphs, with our present imperfect knowledge of the conditions of the sea bed, and of the distributing effect of tides and currents upon a slender line traversing its lower recesses, presents greater difficulties still to overcome than are to recover the fragile cord, is an enterprise of great risk. This has been most strikingly exemplified in Francis Galton's plan for very instructive table of statistics which he published not long ago, showing at a glance the fate of all the submarine telegraph cables yet laid down; three which are now at work being, with the exception of the Persian Gulf line and of that from Malta to Alexandria, exactly a quarter of the whole. Of the rest, half at a moderate length, and were shorter and stronger than many which have failed or have become useless. But the consolation remains that no deep-sea telegraph of any great length has yet lasted more than two years, except, perhaps, the Red Sea cable, which, after working well for 110 miles long, at a depth of 100 fathoms to 325 fathoms, was of the opinion that the insulating material had remained good, after working order for ten years. The Persian Gulf cable, of which we have spoken, is 100 fathoms deep, and the depth of the Red Sea ranges up to sixty fathoms. It appears that, although cables have been raised to the surface, for repairs, from a depth of 300 fathoms or more, it may generally be considered impracticable to repair them at any depth over 200 to 100 fathoms is a moderate and convenient depth for cable repairing, and we have yet to see how far 300-fathom cables have, in this situation, been found permanently successful and effective. From the Persian Gulf submarine telegraphic cable with the Eastern world, soon to be extended to China, will therefore be tolerably secure. From the Chinese province of Indo-China, and from Saigon, to the great commercial port of Singapore, a cable will be laid, at no great distance from the coast, of which the depth of water does not exceeding 50 fathoms; and the same depth prevails from Singapore to Batavia, the capital of Java, to Hong-Kong and Shanghai. But with regard to the Australian branch, we are not yet possess sufficient information to speak confidently of an early realisation of the project, which is urged by the Colonies in the Mercantile Marine. The Lords of the Admiralty, having been requested, a few months back, to survey one of the channels between the Malay Islands, for taking soundings between the east end of Java, the isle of Timor, and Port Darwin, on the north coast of Australia, declined to undertake police service, because the Directors of the Anglo-Australian and China Telegraph Company had not yet made application for the necessary grant, amounting to £24,000. It has, however, since been intimated that the Dutch Government, in the Straits of Java and Timor, will be prepared to act more liberally in this matter than the British Government, with all its rich Australian provinces. The lead telegraphs of Australia proper, from Melbourne to Sydney, from Adelaide to Albany, Sydney, Brisbane, and Port Denison, are now at work; and the Governor of Queensland, Sir Henry Wylie Norman, has written to Melbourne and Victoria to join him in encouraging the scheme for a complete Australasian telegraphic system. The Imperial Government, doubt, therefore, of the ultimate accomplishment of this great object.

The Brazilian Government has granted over to Earl Dundonald the cession of his claim for services rendered by his late father in the name of the independence of Brazil.



The war with Mexico is favourable to the new monarchy. The Imperialists had defeated Negrete at Matamoras with great loss, Negrete himself being wounded. Many of his men had taken Canadas.

Limbach, a Swedish pastor, who murdered several of his parishioners, has been found guilty, which he administered poison to them, has been sentenced to be beheaded.

A letter from Aden to the Pays, states that Captain Cameron has just been from chalest, and will shortly receive his liberty. Messrs. Stern and Rosenthal are also there, as still in prison with him.

The Transatlantic Mail Company's steamer Lafayette arrived at Brest, on Wednesday, from New York, bringing forty-four persons who had been picked up at sea by a vessel and that they were in a boat of about 400 emigrants, who had sailed from Antwerp on board the William Nelson, on voyage for New York. They were in the boat on the morning of the 30th of May. A reward of £7 was granted to the crew of the tubular life-boat of the International Institution of Life-saving, for services rendered on the occasion of the wreck of the ship Cheviot, off Cromer, on the 30th ult. The coat of this life-boat station, amounting to £600, was defrayed by a gentleman very much interested in the matter. It was reported that the Van Kost life-boat of the institution, at North Deal, was launched on the 30th ult., in case of distress, in the wreck of rescuing the crew of the schooner George, which was found abandoned and sunk on the Goodwin Sands, and towed into the Downs by the Ramsgate steamboat's crew. Other rewards were voted to the crews of shore-boats and other vessels for services rendered on the occasion. The Duke of Edinburgh presided, sanctioned to £450, were ordered to be made on various life-boat establishments. New life-boats and transporting carriages had been sent during the past month to North Shields and to Whitby. Both boats were gifts to the institution. The Deven and Cornwall Life-boat Banner, which was to be held at Portsmouth on the 8th and 9th of the ensuing month, under the special patronage of the Prince and Princess of Wales, was reported as likely to be a successful undertaking. Two benevolent ladies, who are known to each other, had expressed a wish to present to the institution the cost £400 of two life-boats, the amount is one to be presented to the Deven and Cornwall Life-boat Banner. The Duke of Edinburgh, who also sent to the institution, through keeping savings. A sailor's daughter has also sent to the institution a donation of £100. The Institution has received a donation of £100. The Institution has now 107 life-boat stations under its management, and during the past eighteen months it contributed to the saving of upwards of 1011 lives from various shipwrecks on our coasts.

"INFANT ORPHAN ELECTION."

THE picture we engrave on the opposite page is one of a clever and popular series, by Mr. Hicks, illustrative of London scenes and life, of which perhaps the most remarkable before the present work was a picture, also exhibited some years ago at the Royal Academy, representing the scene before the General Post Office at "one minute to six," the last "post-time." The subject of the present painting will be more or less familiar to a large section of the benevolent classes of London. It is one essentially pathetic and dramatic in the contrasts it presents, and yet one that is not devoid of food for innocent humour or even for satire to the censorious. The scene is the interior of the large hall of the London Tavern—a hall often redolent with the savours of good cheer and the still sweeter savour of philanthropy, and that often resounds to the music of the dance as well as to the calls of duty and patriotism. On an occasion such as this before us an opportunity is afforded for obeying the Divine injunction to "Remember the widow and the fatherless," and at the same time for enjoying all the excitement of a political contest. We strongly advise some of the candidates offering themselves for the forthcoming election—those especially who may be secretly apprehensive of failure, and who may have already discovered the general apathy of electors—to take a few hints from the practices here recorded to take place at an election of candidates for the Infant Orphan Asylum. Let those lacking local paternal support, influential sponsors, and backers boldly appeal to the pity of constituencies to be returned to the asylum of Parliament as public orphans. What an irresistible sensation header might be borrowed from one of the placards in this picture by some great unknown candidate: "No father, no mother! Second application!" Then, again, although the days have gone by when Duchesses canvassed for votes with kisses, what invaluable touters the ladies seem to be, according to Mr. Hicks! What might not be done by a few committees of such as these? Even children, it appears, may be employed as useful auxiliaries to storm the susceptible heart of Paterfamilias. Seriously, however, this picture has much that is pathetic as well as humorous. While we laugh at the tender-hearted old officer in the centre, charged upon on all sides by women, and dreading to listen for a moment, we smile at the consequential size of the mother on the left, while resolutely refusing to believe that she has any arrière pensée in regard to the pretty daughters she produces under such interesting circumstances; and, while we permit ourselves to be amused with the general bustle and excitement, and to admire the excellent discrimination of character shown, for instance, in the old gentleman wiping his spectacles, the Quaker, and other voters and business-like officials, we must not ignore the strong under-current of sadness which must be experienced on witnessing such a scene as this. What tales of bitter bereavement and dire distress might not be told in connection with some of the applications! Probably, too, only a small proportion of those applicants can be elected. This, if we read the picture aright, is plainly intimated by the anxiety of the young widow on the left, though well supported, and by that of others elsewhere, but still more in the heart-broken disappointment depicted in the attitude and expression of the poor woman on the right, with her unconscious child playing at her side.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

IT there had been any other incidents in Parliament to strike the eye or exclaim the attention they would have all paled and shrunk before the interest which has attached to the practical impeachment and virtual condemnation of a Lord High Chancellor by the Commons' House. As faithful chroniclers, we are, however, bound not to omit mention of an event which was not without its singularity, and which, under other circumstances, we should probably have made much of. Allusion is thus made to the delivery of the Indian Budget. Everyone knows the ordinary features and characteristics of Parliamentary occasions, not to say delusions. But this time the features were exaggerated specially for the occasion, wonderfully, the Indian revenue accounts are stated, though by no means explained, to an audience of twenty-five members, on this occasion the gathering was exactly seven. Generally, the spectators—for "listeners" would be an impropriety word to apply to witness what appears to be a struggle between Sir Charles Wood's sense of duty and a latent desire to avoid the whole subject of Indian affairs; so that the impression that is ordinarily brought away is that there are at once three struggles—that of the spectators, that the revenue has increased and decreased, and that the expositive has disclosed—yet it continues to be a mystery—what the quality of the Minister for India was supposed to have culminated in the fact that he had been, and was, suffering from severe bronchitis. Most of this evil came singular good; for though at times racked with fits of coughing, Sir Charles absolutely never stopped speaking, and was even able to enunciate every word, and was deliberate in his utterance; while by some happy organization, a large half the audience was enabled to be stated distinctly, and so that everyone could understand, all the story of Indian finance, and successfully digested the whole of the statement. For such a feat Sir Charles deserves to be returned to the new Parliament for two places, as means he will be sure to have, and to be accepted by Ripon, he is being earnestly wooed to go back to his old love at Halifax.

After the miserable mess which had been made of the accusations against the Lord Chancellor by an Irish member, whose name most who heard it will have gladly forgot, it was thought that the Government would hardly like to reopen the question. But a stern sense of public duty—a general election pending—compelled Lord John Russell. Lord Hunt gave notice of a killing motion everyone knew that the affair would be quietly prosecuted by the Ministerial party, and that party and in the house is such that it was evident he had been deliberately put forward as a representative gladiator. The discussion was to be given on the Friday for Monday, it may easily be imagined how busy all the staffs of the parties were in order to bring back to town such a House as would give any vote which might be asked for—a House and an authority which would have been out of the question if that election which has been sitting for the last month had been allowed to act in the matter as a living body. Accordingly, on the Monday evening more than hundred members were present—a most respectable House; and during the whole evening, and up to the latest moment before the division, small relays were coming in, so that more than three hundred and fifty or so was attained. It was evident from the first appearance of things that the Lord Chancellor was prepared. He arrive rating in unison and as a party. They crowded forward all together like a flock of sheep. Of course gymnasts, when Mr. Bouverie rose to give notice of an amendment; for they knew the whole proceedings often rise as an agent of the Government in Parliamentary movements which the Ministry themselves are not to formally originate. The earlier part of his amendment, as it was read, justified an expectation of some such movement on his part; but when it came to the last paragraph, and it was found that he had adopted the very words of Mr. Hunt's former motion of censure, there was a sort of gasp of surprise, which if it could have been converted into language would have resolved itself into the cool question, "Is he going to divide?" And it is certain that Mr. Hunt's speech, as delivered, was curiously ineffective. Clearly he meant and wished to do his work well; he was slow, broken, apparently inconsequent, and his points stood like rocks in a vast desert of quotation from the bluebook containing the evidence, which he held in his hand, and in which he was continually losing the extracts which he had marked in the unhandy volume, and which he could by no means cajole out in order to read. He was not able to read them, texts as they were for his argument, freely and readily; and, in short, most people felt that the whole case was thrown away, when one would have suffered if Mr. Hunt had condescended to employ a part of the assistance which Mr. Bouverie's speech had a deadening effect on the House and they went to dine in a regular and systematic fashion when they had heard the case for the prosecution of Dr. Pritchard, the murderer, to defend the Lord Chancellor himself, through his very long and ingenious dissertation, the hearing of which caused some people to think that they had not been a great advantage to Pritchard if he could have obtained the exercise of the learned Lord's powers of mind for his own defence. Positively, when this the second speech of a debate which had brought ahoals of members from the city and the country, and occupied a night, the discussion seemed about to lapse; but the perpetual, the never-ending, the still-beginning, always-to-go-on-to-the-end speech of the subject Mr. Hennessy—the very Figuro of Parliament—intervened with some of his quips and cranks, and gave the House a fillip. Those who, tetanised, as he almost stated, by a desire magnanimously to close for the Lord Chancellor the case of the day, had got up with that fractionary for having once sneered at him in a young lawyer, were induced to get into something akin to a passion in his efforts to prove the necessity for the proposed motion. Again a pause and a prospect of collapse, when Mr. Bouverie, in a passion as much as that of the previous speaker, but differently simulated, went in for a denunciation of the Lord Chancellor, which no member of the Opposition—and certainly no member of the Ministerial Irish member who first stirred in the matter of the Lords Bankruptcy affair—would have ventured to utter, and which was felt to be severe as the crisis of the debate.

In the mean time there must have been an undercurrent of discussion going on amongst the leaders of the Opposition, which left to Mr. Hunt's former offer to withdraw his motion and substitute Mr. Bouverie's amendment for it; the reason of which was afterwards shown Mr. Henley stated that he would not have voted for the first section of Mr. Hunt's motion which, like the Lords, was a strong faculty generally for the exercise of improper influence in obtaining appointments in the public service. Money, had been improperly paid, had been in office, and hoped to be in office again to be asked to agree to such a sweeping censure. Lord J. Russell seemed to have forgotten when he framed it that he himself may one day be a distributor of patronage. Any way, he was not to be committed to the clearly indicated; and, worse still, the result was doubtless known to the Government—"whips," as they were called—and the tone of Lord General but splendid declamation enforced by marked emotion, which, one is sorry to say, was treated by a portion of the House in a good taste, for they seemed to think an exhibition of feeling, highly creditable to the Honourable Member, his subject of derisive laughter. This spirit of outrageous had by this time got into the House, and it was even to be serious or considerate in their demonstrations; and a great deal of the remainder of the discussion was but a repetition of matters that even Mr. Bowes, the Chairman of the Lords Bankruptcy Committee, had pointed out at the first of the debate, when he had signified that the opinion of the Committee was not to interfere in the matter now contended for. Nevertheless, at length arrived—the last hopes of the Ministerial "whips" had passed away with a report of the state of the House—the Ayes from all parts of the country without the accession of a single vote, and the division could no longer be delayed—and the question as to the Government were palpably in a minority. Many of their own adherents were about to follow Mr. Bouverie in his imaginary apostacy, and to swell the ranks of the Opposition, already rampant with the prospect of success. The good genius of Lord Palmerston did not desert him at such an emergency. With perfect composure, but yet with a manner which did not conceal that he was playing a Parliamentary game, he proposed the adjournment of the debate. He hardly affected to believe that everyone could not see that if that was managed there could be only the drop of a House next day, instead of the bumper then in presence, and the motion would be at his mercy; but his real object was—and it was attained—to get a division on the question of adjournment, for which many of his usual supporters would vote as a personal concession who would have seceded from him if the motion of censure had been put and carried. As it was, by accepting the division on the motion for adjournment as the opinion of the House the numbers of the majority were considerably cut down, ment still, which would have gone to magnify the vote against Ministers. Besides, the result was neutralised so far as immediate demonstration was concerned, though there was no doubt of the feeling from the Opposition when they saw Mr. Brand take the wrong side of the lobby when they came up to be counted. The Ministers, assuming, inevitably no doubt, as he always does in such a case, the air of a contrite culprit, Lord Palmerston could have been more decorous than in the reception which both Houses gave on the following day to the announcement of the resignation of the Lord Chancellor, nothing could have been more dignified or in better taste than the brief speech in which he moved proceedings to be in Progress in withdrawal from his high office. There was not a man who heard it who would not feel that his services may have been his errors "most grievous had the expiation been."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord Brougham, referring to comments which had been made with regard to his views on the subject of slavery, denied that he had ever been favorable to the slave trade, or to any measure of the kind proposed.

The Duke of Argyll moving the Committee on the Trusts Administration (Scotland) Bill was read a second time, agreed to.

Lord Redesdale moved for returns on the Post and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Bill was brought up and agreed to.

Their Lordships went into Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill in the Lords-Sessions on Roads Bills.

The Lord Chancellor moved that the Colonial Governors (Retiring Pensions) Bill, the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill, the Penalties Law Amendment Bill, and the Public Works Loans Bill should be read a second time.

The Poor-Law Board Continuance Bill, the Registrar Laws Continuance Bill, the Poor-Law Board Continuance (No. 2) Bill, the Union Assessment Committee Bill, the Consolidated Supplemental (No. 8) Bill, the Clitter Canal Transfer Bill, the Falmouth Harbour Bill, the Penalties Law Amendment Bill, the Public Works Loans (Ireland) Act (1857) Amendment Bill, with an amendment, were read a third time and passed, as also were the Lord Chancellor's Regulation of Proceedings in Bankruptcy Bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, the Northampton and Banbury Junction Railway (Deviation, &c.), the Bodmin and Wadebridge Railway (Deviation, &c.), the Bodmin and Wadebridge Railway, the South Wales and Great Western Direct Railway; the Pontypool, Caerleon, and Newport Railway, the Lancaster Improvement, and the Lancaster Improvement (Extension).

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.—Lord Ebury moved that, in the opinion of the House, the evils arising from the present state of the Established Church in England and Ireland demand the early attention of Parliament. The noble Lord expressed the belief that if the Bishops were to liberally disposed of their patronage the difficulty was that the majority of the clergy were opposed to any alteration of the present state of things. The noble Lord concluded by moving a resolution to the effect that the Bishops should, out of the Session, when the greater portion of the Right Rev. Bench was absent, appoint Lay Readers to assist the clergy in their duties. The noble Lord then proposed to issue a Royal Commission to consider some of the rubrics, but the Duke of Argyll opposed the motion. The Bishop of Oxford also opposed it, as did likewise by the Bishop of London and Earl Grey; and, Lord Ebury persisting with his motion, it was negatived by 61 to 17.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Naval Discipline Bill was read a second time and recommitted.

The Forfar Election Act Amendment Bill and the Lord Advocate's Vicarage Bill passed through Committee.

The Lord Advocate moved the Local Government Supplemental (No. 4) Bill and the Navy and Marines (Property of Deceased) Bill were considered and agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Lord Chancellor announced the receipt of the following letter from the Queen:—"Osborne, Isle of Wight.—I have received from the Lord Chancellor a letter in which he has informed me that he has come to the resolution of resigning the Great Seal, and has stated before a Committee of the House of Lords in the case of Edmonds v. Blake, and in which he is himself a party, that he has been under a want of caution on the part of the Lord Chancellor in sanctioning the grant of an exclusive privilege to a publication of the nature of that which is now impending, and in filling up the vacancies made by the retirement of such officers, without sufficiently guarding the interest of the public therein, and that such laxity and want of caution, even in the absence of any improper motive, is a matter of such grave importance that he considers himself bound to resign the Great Seal. Under the circumstances, and as the reasons here assigned are real and substantial grounds for it, he should be satisfied with Lord Chancellor's resignation. I feel that he should not have taken such a course without the most authentic. This, coupled with other circumstances, has showed a moral obtuseness which renders him unfit to continue to hold the high office he now fills, distinguished as it has been while appertaining to his high office.

The Lord Advocate admitted that it behoved the House to be very jealous of the purity of those who were intrusted with the administration of justice, and he was prepared to support the motion of the noble Lord, which would justify a vote of censure on the Lord Chancellor. The facts, as stated by the noble Lord, were extremely painful; and, moreover, that Richard Bethell had proved a source of great pain and mortification to his friends and to the bar. The Lord Chancellor had acknowledged his error in judgment in the matter, and the Lord Chancellor had no knowledge whatever. He urged that no unnecessary haste should be exhibited in the matter, and that the House should not be precipitate in its proceedings. The Duke of Argyll concluded by moving that the House do now adjourn.

The Lord Chancellor, in reply, said that he did not intend to trouble the House at any length, but he could not allow the motion to be withdrawn without saying a few words. He had not intended to make any defence of his conduct in the matter, but he felt that he was bound to say that he did not impute personal corruption to the Lord Chancellor, but he thought that he had been guilty of great error in judgment in the matter. He had not intended to make any defence, but he had a right to expect at his hands, and that his conduct should be viewed with a favourable eye. He had been in office for many years, and he had never been known as taken an, or favolers or landlicked grounds, the censure would have been a very different one. He had not intended to make any defence, but he had not intended to make any defence, but he had not intended to make any defence, but he in order to set up my own opinion in opposition to the kind feeling which I experienced and the judicious advice which I received, coming, as they did, from one whom I was bound to respect, and to whose authority I felt called upon to defer. I have made this statement, my Lords, simply in the hope that you will believe and that the public will believe that I have not acting to office (Hear, hear), much less that I have been influenced by any desire to retain office for the sake of office. I have felt that the position in which the House of Commons has pronounced I do not presume to say a wrong. I am bound to accept the decision. I may, however, express the hope that after an interval of time calmer thoughts will prevail, and a more favourable view be taken of my conduct. I am thankful for the opportunity which my honour of office has afforded me to propose and pass measures which have improved your Lordship's opposition, and which I believe—nay, I will venture from experience to predict—will be productive of great benefit to the whole country. With those measures I hope my name will be associated (Hear, hear). I regret deeply that a great measure which I had at heart—I refer to the formation of a digest of the whole law—I have been unable to inaugurate; for it is one which I feel sure would have conferred a boon of the highest value for that purpose. That great scheme, my Lords, I respectfully submit to your Lordships and to the successor (Hear, hear). As for the future, I only can say, as my colleagues will, it will be our endeavour to discharge the duties of a private member of your Lordships' House, to promote and assist in the practicable removal of all those reforms and improvements which the experience of practice which I feel yet remain to be carried out (Cheers). I may add, in reference to the question of jurisdiction of your Lordships' House, that I am happy to say it is left in a state which will, I think, be found to be satisfactory. There will not be at the close of the Session a single judgment in arrear, save one in which the arguments, after occupying several days, were brought to a conclusion only the day before yesterday (Hear, hear). In the Court of Chancery, I am glad to be able to inform your Lordships, I do not think that there remains a single case in which judgment is not either delivered or under consideration (Cheers). I mention these things to show that it has been my earnest desire from the moment I assumed the seals of office to devote all the energies I possessed and all the leisure I could find to the discharge of public service (Cheers). My Lords, it only remains for me to thank you, which I do most sincerely, for the kindness which I have uniformly received at your hands. It is very possible that by some word inadvertently said—and experience of many years may have given me, at least, an apology for such unfavourable opinion. If that be so, I beg of you to accept the sincere expression of my regret, while I implore that I may be in no circumstances may be erased from your memories (Cheers). I have no more to say, my Lords, except to thank you for the kindness which I may have listened to these observations (Loud cheers).

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

At twelve o'clock the Imperial Parliament was prorogued, prior to dissolution. The Royal commissioners were Earl Granville, the Earl of St. Germans, Lord Eversley, Lord Wensleydale, and Lord Sydney.

The Royal assent was given by the Commissioners to the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill, the bill for the regulation of dockyards, and to several private bills.

Earl Granville then presented the Queen's Speech, and a large number of Members of the House of Commons, then read the following message:—

HER MAJESTY'S MESSAGE.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

We are commanded by her Majesty to release you from further attendance in Parliament, and, at the same time, to convey to you her Majesty's acknowledgments for the zeal and assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the discharge of your duties in the Session now brought to a close.

We are further commanded to inform you that the present Parliament has now nearly lasted the period assigned by law for the duration of Parliaments that you could not enter upon another Session without a message to the public interest, it is her Majesty's intention immediately to dissolve the present Parliament and to issue writs for the calling of a new one.

But her Majesty cannot take leave of Parliament without commanding us to express to you her Majesty's deep sense of the real and public spirit which, during the last few years of your existence as a House of Commons, you have displayed in the discharge of important functions, and tendering to you her Majesty's warm and hearty judgments for the wise and prudent measures you have submitted for her acceptance, and which have greatly conduced to the elimination of the public burdens and to the encouragement of industry; to the increase of the wealth and to the prosperity and to the general contentment of her Majesty's people.

We are commanded to inform you that her Majesty's relations with foreign Powers are friendly and satisfactory, and she trusts that there are no questions pending which are likely to lead to any disturbance of the peace of Europe.

Her Majesty rejoices that the civil war in North America has ended, and she trusts that the evils caused by that long contest may be repaired, and that prosperity may be promoted in the States which have been the seat of war.

Her Majesty regrets that the conferences and communications between her Majesty's North American Provinces as to the best mode of union of those provinces in a confederation have not yet led to a satisfactory result. Such a union would afford additional strength to those provinces and would provide for many internal improvements. Her Majesty has received gratifying assurances of the devoted loyalty of her North American subjects.

Her Majesty sees at the continuance of the prosperous and progressive state of her Indian dominions; and she trusts that the large supply which those territories will afford of the raw material of cotton, increased greatly through with the termination of the civil war in the United States of North America, will promote the improvement of the fiscal resources, and the general and manufacturing population of some of the northern countries.

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Her Majesty commands us to convey to you her warm acknowledgments for the alacrity with which you have granted to her Majesty for the service of the present year, and towards the permanent defence of her Majesty's dockyards and arsenals.

The Commercial Treaty with France has recently concluded with Prussia and the other States composing the Zollverein Commercial Union, by her Majesty's commands, been laid before you. Her Majesty trusts that this treaty will contribute to the development of commercial relations between France and Germany, and will remove the restrictions which on several countries which are parties to it.

Her Majesty commands us to assure you that her attention will continue to be directed to all such measures as may be calculated to extend and to place on a sound footing the trade between her Majesty's dominions and foreign countries.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

Her Majesty leaves her conduct assured to many measures of public usefulness, the result of your labours in the Session now brought to a close.

The Act for rendering the expenses incurred for the support of the poor chargeable upon the whole of a union instead of being confined to particular parishes will diminish the hardship inflicted upon the labouring poor by reason of removals from parish to parish.

The Partnership Amendment Act will tend to encourage the profitable employment of capital.

The Courts of Justice Building and Concentration Acts will, it is hoped, lessen the expense and shorten the duration of legal proceedings.

The Contagious Diseases Act, founded on the recommendations of a Royal Commission, will remove objections which have been felt to the number and variety of the Acts for the prescription and detection of contagious disease in the army.

The management and discipline of prisons will be improved by the Act for the consolidation and amendment of the laws on that subject.

The County Court Equitable Jurisdiction Act will give a useful extension to the local administration of justice.

The Act for Consolidating the Constabulary of the Exchequer with the Board of Inland Revenue will increase the efficiency and economy of conducting the public accounts.

The Act for Consolidating the Record of Titles in Ireland will render more easy and secure the transfer of land.

The Act for Amending the Laws which govern the Constabulary Force in Ireland will tend to prevent the recurrence of such disorders as happened last year at Belfast.

The Colonial Naval Defence Act has removed restrictions which have hitherto prevented the colonies from taking effectual measures for their own defence against attacks by sea.

Her Majesty has also gladly given her assent to many other useful measures of less general importance.

The electors of the United Kingdom will soon be called upon again to choose their representatives in Parliament; and her Majesty fervently prays that the blessing of Almighty God may attend their proceedings, and may guide them towards the attainment of the object of her Majesty's constant solicitude—the welfare and happiness of her people.

Parliament was then formally prorogued until the 19th of July.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at twelve o'clock. Sir Augustus Clifford, the Usher of the Black Rod, appeared at the bar, and commanded the House to the House of Lords to hear the Royal assent given by Commission to certain bills.

The Speaker, having returned, read the Queen's Speech, and, having received the congratulations of the members present, the House was prorogued until the 12th of July.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The congregation of St. Mark's, Kennington, have presented to the Rev. Edward Wyvill, B.D., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and late curate of that church, a purse containing fifty guineas. The rev. gentleman and family left Kennington on Monday.

On Thursday the Earl of Powis laid the foundation-stone of a new church, to be erected at Welshpool, in the room of the present old edifice, in Essex. After the ceremony there was a luncheon and a distribution of prizes, &c., to the children of the Welshpool National and Cherry Orchard Schools.

The Rev. Derwent Coleridge, Rector of Hanwell, preached at St. Paul's Cathedral last Sunday morning. The other preachers for the month are:—To-morrow, the 9th, the Rev. Joseph Barnabas Hamilton, Perpetual Curate of St. Mary's, Lambeth; 16th, the Rev. Charles Clerke Rowan Dibdin, Incumbent of St. Michael's Church, Highgate; 23rd, the Rev. W. Calvert, Perpetual Curate of St. John the Baptist, Kentish Town; 30th, the Rev. C. Mackenzie, Rector of St. Benet's, Gerrard's-street.

The following appointments to livings and preferments have recently been made:—The Rev. W. Moore, late Curate of Otley, Bucks, to be Surrogate for the Archdeaconry of Buckingham; the Rev. John Mary Bird, M.A., to the Missionary, to be Rector of St. Peter's, Lagnan, diocese of Guiana; Rev. C. Hall, M.A., late Rector of Bishop's Tawton, to be Vicar of St. Mary's and Polsworth, Hants, Rev. W. Abbott to be Vicar of St. Martin's, Lincoln; Rev. C. C. Carter to be Vicar of Hinckley, Leicester; Rev. T. Tudor O'Donoghue, Vicar of Twickenham, to be Incumbent of Walsden, Lancashire.

The Bishop of London has appointed Dr. Ogle, Assistant Physician at Guy's, and Dr. Andrew's Convalescent Hospitals, in connection with the House of Mercy, at Clewer, near Windsor. The said hospital is for the care and cure, on more than three years, in rented cottages in the neighbourhood of the House of Mercy, and is to be the first step in a system of female education in effort for its enlargement and permanent establishment; it is therefore proposed to erect a building, to be called "The Memorial Hospital to the House of Mercy, to accommodate twenty-four men, eighteen women, and fifteen incurable children, and to contain a chapel, in which the patients may have been actively engaged, with members of the council, in promoting its success.

The Rev. Edward Coleridge, B.A., Eton and Balliol, has been appointed by the Crown to the bishopric of Chester, rendered vacant by the death of the Right Rev. John Graham, who was educated at Catherine College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1827, when he took a second class in classics, and was afterwards elected a Fellow of Merton. He was also Rector of Exeter College. In 1837 he became Vice-Principal of Magdalen Hall; and in 1843, and again in 1847, he was Select Preacher before the University of Oxford, and public orator. In 1848, on the elevation of Dr. R. D. Hampden to the bishopric of Hereford, he was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity, and was also a canon residentiary of Christ Church. In 1850 he was presented by the Crown to the rectory of Ewelme, near Wallingford, are annexed. For a short time previously to 1850 he was also a canon residentiary of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, of Ilfley, to which he was nominated by Archdeacon Clerke. He is the author of several theological works.

The Bishop of Manchester consecrated the new church of St. Luke, Cheetham, on Thursday morning, in the presence of a large congregation. The edifice stands on the site of the former one, in Bedford-street, which was built before anything in that region. It was erected at the cost of Mr. Robert Gardner, of Cheadle, the patron of the living, and Mrs. Gardner, in memory of the late Mr. Peter Ewart, of Mr. W. Atkinson, of Ashton Hayes, Cheshire, and who died in early life. The church is in the Gothic style, and will seat about 1,000 persons. The tower, 120 ft. high, contains nine and chancel, which together are about 90 ft. long; a north aisle, and a baptistery at the west end. The cost of the church was £7,000, of which £3 are free. The tower is prominently placed at the junction of Bedford-street and Cheetham-hill-road, and will be a landmark to the surrounding population, surmounted by a gilt cross and vane.

The Bishop of Manchester has had a conference with the London Diocesan Church-Building Society, the object of which comprehends a consideration of the necessity for increasing the means of church accommodation in the diocese of London towards building, enlarging, and endowing churches, building parsonages, providing schools, and other matters of ecclesiastical arrangements, and employing missionary curates in destitute districts, was laid on the table of the House of Commons on Thursday. The Bishop of London, in the chair, and the Rev. Sydney Smith, Rector of St. Mary-le-Strand, the general secretary, was read by the Rev. W. D. Maclagan, the secretary, from the report of the Church-Building Society, and the annual statement of the Bishop of London's Fund. Although, however, no doubt a movement has been made in the right direction, the Bishop of London is simply an emanation from that society; and so that movement was not of a permanent character. The sum of £1,000 a year, which had been resolved to maintain this society as a permanent institution contributed by the Bishop of London's Fund, and the annual subscriptions and matter of the Bishop of London's Fund that the moneys contributed spontaneously by the clergy and laity were not sufficient to maintain the Metropolitan Church-Building Fund. Under that resolution the sum placed at the disposal of the Church-Building Society was £1,000 a year for five years, and the last of the years for the society's operations having been extended. The annual statement of receipts and expenditure from May 1, 1864, to April 30, 1865, it appeared that the receipts for the year had amounted to £1,000 for the year of £8,079, the total receipts had been £13,427. The payments had been in grants, £4,000; in annuities, £1,000; in salaries, £1,000; in contributions for special objects, £143; and other items; leaving a balance of £1,284 in the hands of the bankers. That balance was entirely adopted.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The ceremony of distributing the prizes in connection with the Faculty of Arts and Laws at University College, London, took place on Wednesday—Mr. Grant Duff, M.P., in the chair. Lord Brougham (President of the college) was present. The Dean (Professor Malden) read the report, from which it appeared that the number of students in the classes of the faculty during the session was 211, being an increase of 19 on the number in the last session. The new arrangements was 112. During last year a change was made in the application of the funds arising from the Hodgson Bequest. The report stated that—

The annual distribution of prizes at Marlborough College took place, on July 1, in the presence of the Bishop of Salisbury, the Provost of Eton, the Universities, and a large number of the friends of the college. The Bishop of Salisbury presided, and A. R. Cowell and M. E. Yeatman (equal) of the Junior Classical Scholarship, founded in memory of Mr. Bonamy Price (£30) to E. L. Bevan; the Modern School Scholarships (£30) to J. W. Harris and J. K. Cripps. The Hodgson Scholarship, which has been established this year to perpetuate the memory of one of the oldest and best friends of the college (Mr. Christopher Hodgson), was awarded to A. C. Bennett. For honours gained by former and present members of the school since Midsummer, 1864, have been numerous and important. Lord Brougham, among other successes, four Fellowships at Oxford; seven First Classes; the Chancellor University Prize for English Essay; and nine open Scholarships at Oxford and Scholarships Prize at Cambridge; and nine open Scholarships at Oxford and Cambridge.

The Rev. Dr. Collis has appointed Mr. Henry Chevreul, B.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, to be Professor of Mathematics, and Mr. Pendlebury, Cambridge, to succeed Mathematics at Birmingham School.

The ratifications of the commercial treaty between Great Britain and the Zollverein were formally exchanged yesterday week at Berlin.

On the 16th of June a stone monument, 27 ft. high, was erected, with due ceremonial, on a cross a little south of Henry-the-Fowler, in memory of the patriots who fell at Ball Run, July 21, 1861. The spot selected is where Bonnieclaus's division made their hardest fight, but were finally driven back by Kirby Smith. A considerable force of troops was on the ground, and the ceremonies were conducted with much solemnity. Governor Brough, some subordinates delivered, and then a public address was read by Captain Smith's Massachusetts battery on the same spot where Rickold's battery was captured. The battle-field itself presents few evidences of the engagement. Here and there a mound indicates a grave, but they are not numerous, and the only relic found was an old musket-lock.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Queen has approved of Mr. H. Blyth Hammond as Consul at Bangassi and Dual, and of Mr. John Somerville, Jun., as Consul at Lotin, for the King of the Belgians.

The inauguration of the Art-Exhibition at Alton Towers, which was to have taken place on Wednesday, has been postponed until Monday next, the 10th inst.

A fire took place on Tuesday night, at Aldershott. The camp fire-brigade was soon on the spot, and made great exertions to isolate the flames, but a good deal of damage was done. On Wednesday morning a fire took place at the Safety Powder Company's Magazine, Worce, Hanmore, Plymouth, where the factory, with much of the material, was burnt down, but no explosion took place and no lives were lost.

The town and harbour of Harwich presented a gay appearance on Wednesday, the annual regatta attracting a large number of visitors. The programme included a competition for a Thames six, and a match between Harwich and Ipswich fishermen. There were also prizes for dredging-boats belonging to Harwich and Walton, rowing-matches between galley-boats belonging to Harwich, Harwich pilot-cutter boats, and amateur boat-races.

A great demonstration took place in Scarborough last Saturday afternoon, the occasion being the opening to the public of the Clarence Gardens. Every public body in the town was represented in the demonstration. A ledge of rocks has been blasted away, and the Corporation have purchased Williamson to bar back in 1849, since the Corporation have purchased the intervening property to construct one. The bridge is now completed, with the exception of a few small details, and was opened as a public toll-bridge on Saturday, for the first time.

Yesterday week the annual show of the Bellfordshire Agricultural show was held, in union with that of the Floricultural Society, in meadows adjoining Castle-hill, Bedford. The show of roots was far more extensive than that of the previous year. Over 4,000 was given in prizes, £403 of which was given by the Duke of Bedford. Mr. James Howard, Mayor, was the principal promoter of the special effort made to bring this meeting into prominence. The dinner was held in the spacious picture gallery of the Britannia Works. Upwards of 300 persons sat down, the company including Mr. Howard, Mayor; Lord Ampthill, Lieutenant-Colonel Lort Charles Gilpin, M.P.; Hastings Russell, Esq., M.P.; S. Whitbread, Esq., M.P.; and Colonel Stuart, M.P., of Luton.

Mr. Coxwell ascended, on Monday, in his balloon "Research" from the Botanic Gardens, Regent's Park, at Belfast. He was accompanied by Mr. Bland, and the ascent was witnessed by about 10,000 persons. The balloon was covered over by a net, and the car, in which the voyagers sat, was hung on swing to the valve at the top not acting properly. Several persons were injured by the balloon and car being dragged along the ground. Two gentlemen succeeded in getting out, when the balloon suddenly went up again, and was soon out of sight. Mr. Coxwell, it is said, has not been heard of safely, though much shaken. The balloon was wrecked on the Antrim coast, and Mr. Bland was found lying on the ground, with his head cut and bruised; but there were hopes both would recover.

The Government emigration officers at Liverpool have completed their returns of emigrants who departed during the month from the Mersey. During the quarter ending June there sailed from Liverpool 147 vessels, with 1,710 cabin and 1,234 steerage passengers, of whom 1,000 were British, and 1,944 foreigners; in the month of June, 1865, there sailed from the United States twenty-four ships under the Act, with 28 cabin and 1,094 steerage passengers, of whom 941 were English, 1,217 Irish, 2428 Irish, and 1,761 foreigners; to Canada there were five ships, with 162 cabin and 1,000 steerage passengers, of whom 1,000 were English, 1,000 Irish, and 819 foreigners; to Queensland there was one ship, with 4 cabin and 161 steerage passengers, of whom 1 was English, 1 Irish, and 163 Irish; in all there were two ships, with 1 cabin and 401 steerage passengers, of whom 165 were English, 26 Scotch, 1,000 Irish, 1,000 foreigners; and to Natal there was one ship, and 1,087 steerage. Of "short ships," there sailed to the United States four, with 1,000 steerage passengers; to Canada, one ship, with 1,000 steerage; to Australia, one ship, with 1,000 steerage; to Natal, two, with 12 passengers; to South America, three, with 1,000 passengers; to Mexico, one, with 1,000 passengers; to Africa, one, with 25 passengers; total, thirteen ships and 4,037 passengers.

From census returns made out on the 10th of April we learn that the population of the district of Valparaiso amounts to 71,402 inhabitants, of which 36,000 are males, and 35,402 females, and in this number are 4,779 foreigners. The city of Valparaiso itself contains 70,168 inhabitants.

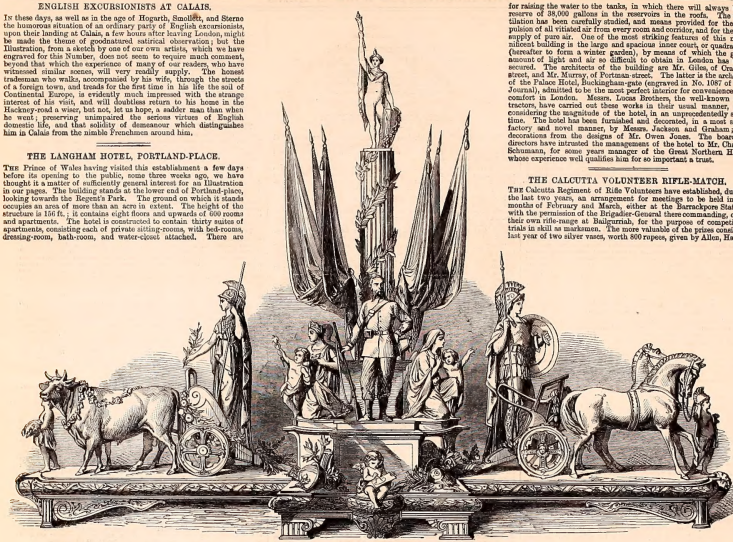
The report of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education to the Queen in Council for the year 1864 has been issued in a blue-book. The number of schools in union, as compared with 1863, has increased by 1,102 principal school-rooms, 1,102 dwellings for teachers, furniture and apparatus for 1,102 additional pupil-teachers, and 1,102 additional schools were created for the reception of 1,102 pupil-teachers, who were duly examined, but not enlarged. The inspectors visited 11,818 daily schools, or 1,102 more than in 1863, and examined 1,102 more teachers. There were in them 1,321,291 children; 10,196 certificated teachers, 693 assistant teachers, and 11,712 apprentices. The number of schools examined was 11,818, but only 2,098 for girls only; in 3139 boys and girls were instructed together; 1795 were infant schools, and the remainder were mixed schools for 4,059 night-schools. Of the children, 633,810 were males and 499,451 were females. The inspectors report that the progress of education is very satisfactory. Students in preparation for the office of schoolmaster or schoolmistress. In 1864 there were 1,102 pupil-teachers, who were duly examined, and 1,102 were admitted to be apprenticed for the second year of apprenticeship, as assistants or certificates as acting teachers. Of the twenty-six reports on examinations which the inspectors have sent in, we are included in the volume, two thirds contain a decidedly favourable judgment of the working of the pupil-teacher code, so far as regards the change introduced in the mode of examination and payment. The less favourable judgments turn chiefly on questions of discipline, attendance, neglect of home lessons, and inexperience with pupil teachers. Respecting the income of the training colleges, the Committee remarks that it cannot help wishing that the act of income (1864) of £121,241, to which the State contributed £80,186, for the year 1863, had been more satisfactorily applied. The Committee has pressed on the attention of the managers of these colleges the annual return of the number of students in each college at the diocese, or religious communion, with which each college is connected, and on behalf of its other institutions would become better known to the public, and might obtain more general support."

OPEN SPACES IN THE METROPOLIS.—The second report of the Committee appointed by the Commissioners of Common Lands to inquire into the best means for the removals of the Committee extend over twenty pages of a blue-book, and contain a considerable amount of matter. That no inference shall take place under the provisions of the Inclosure Act within the metropolitan district, except with a view to application to be made for the preservation of commons and open spaces within the metropolitan area; and that the power of inclosure, in the case of public safety is concerned, should extend to all open spaces in the metropolitan area.

THE ELCHO CHALLENGE SHIELD.

We have on former occasions, often had to speak of the iron shield which Lord Elcho has presented to the National Rifle Association, to be competed for by the Volunteers of the United Kingdom, and of each yearly meeting on Wimbledon-common, and to be held, during the ensuing twelvemonth, in possession as a challenge trophy. A model of the shield has been exhibited, for two or three years past, at the annual shooting matches when the noble President has been accustomed to perform the ceremony of consigning it to the custody of the Englishman, or of the Scotchman, as the case might be, who had gained the highest number of points. The shield itself, an elaborate work of wrought iron, has now been completed by Messrs. Elkington, of Regent-street, the well-known electro-plate establishment in Birmingham. Its design (of which we publish an illustration) is from the pencil of Mr. J. Williams, the artist employed by them. It has the merit of being very intelligible, as well as noble and appropriate in its conception and execution. A medallion of the Queen, wearing her crown, occupies the centre; beneath this are two volunteer rifle-corps officers, standing, with their rifles at present, with a brotherly clasp of their hands, despite the ancient remembrances of Flodden and Bannockburn, sculptured on each side. The groups in relief on each side of the band of her Majesty represent Queen Elizabeth reviewing her troops at Tilbury Fort, and Queen Victoria giving the prizes to her loyal volunteers at Wimbledon. Above the heraldic insignia, and other emblems of nationality, which separate the lower from the upper compartment of the shield, is seen the august form of Britannia, with the Lion at her back, while Peace and Plenty, with other allegorical personages, are seated in repose at her feet. We may anticipate a good contest next week for the honour of possessing this noble prize, which will not be grudged to those whose superior skill may deserve it, whether hailing from the north or south of the Tweed.

ENGLISH EXCURSIONISTS AT CALAIS.



IN these days, as well as in the age of Hogarth, Smollett, and Sterne the humorous situation of an ordinary party of English excursionists, upon their landing at Calais, a few hours after leaving London, might be made the theme of goodnatured satirical observation; but the illustration, from a sketch by one of our own artists, which we have engraved for this Number, does not seem to require much comment, beyond that which the experience of many of our readers, who have witnessed similar scenes, will very readily supply. The honest tradesman who walks, accompanied by his wife, through the streets of a foreign town, and treads for the first time in his life the soil of Continental Europe, is evidently much impressed with the strange interest of his visit, and will doubtless return to his home in the Hackney-road a wiser, but not, let us hope, a sadder man than when he went; preserving unimpaired the serious virtues of English domestic life, and that solidity of demeanour by which distinguishes him in Calais from the nimble Frenchmen around him.

THE LANGHAM HOTEL, PORTLAND-PLACE.

THE Prince of Wales having visited this establishment a few days before its opening to the public, some three weeks ago, we have thought it a matter of sufficiently general interest for an Illustration in our pages. The building stands at the lower end of Portland-place, looking towards the Regent's Park. The ground on which it stands occupies an area of more than an acre in extent. The height of the structure is 156 ft.; it contains eight floors and upwards of 600 rooms and apartments. The hotel is constructed to contain thirty suites of apartments, consisting each of private sitting-rooms, with bed-rooms, dressing-room, bath-room, and water-closet attached. There are altogether upwards of 300 bed-rooms, also dressing-rooms, and thirty-six baths, fourteen lavatories, and upwards of one hundred water-closets. The public rooms consist of a grand salle à manger 100 ft. long, with a width of 40 ft.; a spacious coffee-room, and rooms for public purposes, 50 ft. by 50 ft.; ladies' coffee and drawing rooms; billiard and smoking rooms; board-room and secretary's room; rooms for committee meetings; rooms on each floor for service. The entrance hall is 50 ft. square, and opening from it are two grand stone staircases, continued to the topmost floors. In the entrance hall is a post and telegraph office, an indicator clerk's office, whose sole business is to attend to bells of the various rooms; also porters' rooms. There is an ascending passenger lift, worked by hydraulic power, capable of carrying six persons to the summit of the building, and communicating with each floor. There are, besides the passenger lift, also luggage lifts, dinner-service lifts, and a coal lift, all worked by hydraulic power. There are two floors below the level of the pavement, containing large and lofty kitchens, scullieries, and pantries, fitted with all the most approved apparatus of the cuisine and every requisite for a building of its kind. The cellarage is unusually capacious. In the upper of these two last-mentioned floors bed and sitting rooms are provided for visitors' servants, and for the servants of the hotel in the mezzanine floor. The entire of the ground and basement floors are fireproof, also the whole of the corridors. The corridors on each floor encircle the entire building, and open on four different staircases, affording safe and speedy egress. There is always a large and constant supply of pure spring water, raised by a steam pumping-engine from an artesian well, constructed on the premises, nearly 300 ft. deep. The water is raised to capacious iron tanks in the towers, and thence distributed over the whole building, the daily consumption being estimated at not less than 25,000 gallons. There is also an extensive laundry on the premises, for the service of the hotel and convenience of the visitors. There are two 16-horse power boilers for supplying steam to the cooking apparatus, the warming of the building, and to the engine for raising the water to the tanks, in which there will always be a reserve of 38,000 gallons in the reservoirs in the roofs. The ventilation has been carefully studied, and means provided for the expulsion of all vitiated air from every room and corridor, and for the full supply of pure air. One of the most striking features of this magnificent building is the large and spacious inner court, or quadrangle (hereafter to form a winter garden), by means of which the great amount of light and air so difficult to obtain in London has been secured. The architects of the building are Mr. Giles, of Craven-street, and Mr. Murray, of Portman-street. The latter is the architect of the Palace Hotel, Buckingham-gate (engraved in No. 1067 of this Journal), admitted to be the most perfect interior for convenience and comfort in London. Messrs. Lucas Brothers, the well-known contractors, have carried out these works in their usual manner, and, considering the magnitude of the hotel, in an unprecedentedly short time. The hotel has been furnished and decorated, in a most satisfactory and novel manner, by Messrs. Jackson and Graham; the decorations from the designs of Mr. Owen Jones. The board of directors have intrusted the management of the hotel to Mr. Charles Schumann, for some years manager of the Great Northern Hotel, whose experience well qualifies him for so important a trust.

THE CALCUTTA VOLUNTEER RIFLE-MATCH.

THE Calcutta Regiment of Rifle Volunteers have established, during the last two years, an arrangement for meetings to be held in the months of February and March, either at the Barrackpore Station, with the permission of the Brigadier-General there commanding, or at their own rifle-range at Bailgurriah, for the purpose of competitive trials in skill as marksmen. The more valuable of the prizes consisted last year of two silver vases, worth 800 rupees, given by Allen, Hayes, and Co.; a Whitworth breech-loading rifle; a silver cup, timepiece, and tankard, given by Major-General Sir R. Napier; a prize of 1000 rupees, given by the Governor-General; a silver vase, given by Messrs. G. Nephew and Co.; a breech-loading rifle, given by Messrs. Lodka and Co.; and several other articles which are shown, as placed on the table, in our Illustration. The gentlemen grouped around this table are the successful competitors of the two last annual meetings—namely, Lieutenant J. Mackenzie, Captain M. J. Pearson, Lieutenant Fred. G. Teale, Private E. Lone, and Private J. Morrison, in the front row, sitting; Corporal Fink, Colour-Sergeant G. Robb, Sergeant Humphreys, Private Goebels, Private D. C. Creaton, Sergeant Dods, Sergeant Boggs, Captain John Rose, Sergeant Macdonald, Private Peate, and Private Hannah, in the back row, standing. No man was allowed to carry off more than one prize. For this year's meeting a Rigby rifle, given by Colonel Douglas; and silver vases, given by Dr. Barry, the Hon. W. S. Fitzwilliam, and the Hon. W. Grey, were added to the prizes of last year.

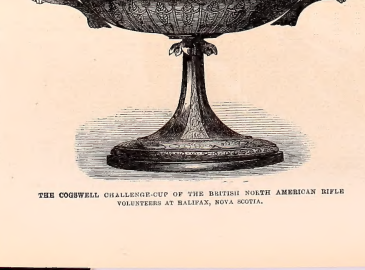
THE INTERNATIONAL VOLUNTEER CHALLENGE TROPHY TO BE SHOT FOR AT THE WIMBLEDON MEETING.

PRIZES AND PRIZE-WINNERS OF THE CALCUTTA VOLUNTEER RIFLE MATCHES AT BARRACKPORE.

THE INTERNATIONAL VOLUNTEER CHALLENGE TROPHY.

It should be understood that the International Trophy which is to be shot for annually at Wimbledon, with the volunteer regulation rifle, by sides of twenty English and twenty Scotch efficient volunteers, is altogether a different prize from the Elcho Challenge Shield; the competition in Lord Elcho's match being eight on a side, who may shoot with small-bore weapons, or any rifles beside those which are prescribed for ordinary volunteer use. The International Volunteer Match, shot for in 1864 for the first time, and permanently instituted at the Wimbledon meetings, will have the separate and distinct purpose of encouraging practice with the rifle which is put into every volunteer's hand. The prize contended for last year was nothing more than a documentary certificate; and though the spirit of honourable rivalry would induce many a crack shot to risk his reputation on the chance of winning a mere slip of paper, still it was thought desirable to have a substantial trophy which might be held in the guardianship of some great public institution, such as the British Museum. Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. C. H. Lindsay was requested to take the lead in this popular scheme; and the committee whom he called about him included some of the first names in England and Scotland. The designs of some of the best silversmiths in England were publicly exhibited at Willis's Rooms a few months ago. The number of designs submitted for approval was twenty-two. A committee of taste undertook to pronounce judgment; the names of Sir Charles Locke Eastlake, P.R.A., Mr. Daniel Maclise, R.A., Mr. Redgrave, R.A., Mr. Foley, R.A., and Mr. Layard, M.P., being among them. Their choice fell, most deservedly, on a design which had been sent in by Messrs. Elkington and Co., the merit of the invention being due to their artist, Mr. Auguste Willms. With one or two improvements suggested by Mr. Foley, and approved by his fellow-judges, this bold and pleasing piece of allegorical sculpture, adapted to the art-workmanship of the silversmith, is a very remarkable specimen of the art. Its design must be explained. In the centre of an oblong plateau stands a pedestal surrounded by figures, from the midst of which rises a column, surmounted by another figure. At each end of the plateau is an allegorical group—one illustrative of Peace, the other of War. Peace is typified by a representation of Minerva bearing the traditional olive branch, and standing in a car adorned with fruit and flowers. The car is drawn by oxen, harnessed with garlands, indicating the easy yoke of government in times of peace, and led by a youth who bears a sheaf as a sign of plenty. At the other end of the plateau, Mars, the god of war, rides in a car embellished with arms and laurels, drawn by horses, led by Valour in the form of a youth. The war group behind displays the badge of the National Rifle Association, and his attitude, full of majestic power, shows that he is calmly awaiting the signal of attack. Somewhat similar is the expression conveyed by the figures of two volunteers, one in the English, the other in the Scotch uniform, who stand on each side of the pedestal against the column. They "stand at ease," yet are ready for action. The sentiment is made still plainer by the motives inscribed on the shield, one under each of these figures — "Si vis pacem, para bellum," and "Defence, not Defiance." Spaces are left on the pedestal for appropriate inscriptions, which will be added from time to time; and in front of those spaces are seated figures whose accessories indicate the essentials of a good rifleman—correct judgment of distance and precision of aim. Four allegorical groups occupy other portions of the pedestal. Of these one side shows the blessings of peace, represented by two happy matrons with their children, surrounded by the attributes of Commerce, Navigation, Science, and Art. The evils of war are suggested by the figures of a woman who is endeavouring to restrain her boy from following the god of war to the field, and a mother consoling her son, who has met with reverses, indicated by his broken sword and desponding attitude. The central column takes the form of a bundle of fasces, bound with wreaths of laurel, and surrounded by flags, emblematic of the various nations who are united with the British Crown. On the top of the column stands the Genius of Patriotism, guarding the garlanded shields of England and Scotland.

The subscription-list in support of the fund for the cost of the International Challenge trophy will remain open, so that those who may feel an interest in so national and creditable a work, and who may wish to be identified with it, may have an opportunity of becoming contributors at any time. The list of subscribers will accompany the model to Wimbledon and be open for inspection. Our illustration represents the model as it now stands. The trophy will be completed, according to Colonel Lindsay's agreement with Messrs. Elkington, by the next meeting of the National Rifle Association in 1866, before which time it will be decided what national institution in Great Britain is to become its guardian.



THE ELCHO CHALLENGE SHIELD TO BE SHOT FOR BY ENGLISH AND SCOTCH RIFLE VOLUNTEERS AT THE WIMBLEDON MEETING.—SEE PAGE 11.

CHALLENGE CUP OF THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

ONE of our Engravings represents a cup, given by Mr. James C. Cogswell, Major in the 4th Halifax (Nova Scotia) Queen's Regiment, for competition among the riflemen of British North America at the match to take place at Halifax this Midsummer. The cup, manufactured by Messrs. Phillips, of Newport-street, was designed by Mr. Cogswell himself. It is of silver, with bands of the same, heavily gilt. The lid is richly chased, and represents, in four spirited sketches, the chief elements of Nova Scotia's prosperity—viz., agriculture, fisheries, mining, and commerce; the whole being surmounted by a beautiful model of the ship May Flower, the provincial emblem. The handles are represented by dolphins. The crest of the donor, and the words on the front of the cup—"The Cogswell Challenge Cup"—are balanced on the reverse side by the arms of Nova Scotia. The value of the cup is eighty guineas. It is probable that this gift to our fellow-subjects across the water, given by one of themselves, may originate others of a similar class, and may perhaps beget, ere long, a Transatlantic Wimbledon, with prizes open to all comers. Should this happen, and should any of the riflemen of England be tempted to try their skill over there, it is possible that they will find among the competitors who will shoot for the Cogswell cup, some rivals whose prowess is not to be slighted; and who have added to the keen eye and the steady hand of the deerstalker all those Hythe rules and regulations which have made a science of a sport.

THE DRAGON CUP OF THE ST. GEORGE'S RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

THIS graceful little cup has been manufactured by Messrs. Ortner and Houle, St. James's-street, under the direction of Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. C. H. Lindsay, commanding the St. George's Rifles, by whom it was originally as a rifle prize, in connection with the St. George's Challenge Vase, of which we published an Engraving three or four years ago. The Dragon Cup is of antique form, and at the same time original in its details. The stand is surmounted by a bound barrel wreath, the stem of which is engraved with the words "The Dragon Cup," and the base is adorned with foreated leaves. The bowl of the cup is ornamented in the Grecian style, and embellished with bunches of the rose, shamrock, and thistle at intervals. On the front face of the cup appears a Norman shield, intended to bear the inscription relative to the successful volunteer in the contest. The lid is surmounted with a dragon grasping a scroll, upon which will be inscribed the year when the cup was won. The handles are formed of a pair of weirdlike and fantastic winged dragons, clinging to the sides of the cup with distended mouths. The cup is of sterling silver, and is embellished with gold reliefs. The Dragon Cup will be repeated annually, and form, as it now does, the prize of the second stage of the competition for the St. George's Challenge Vase.

THE COGSWELL CHALLENGE-CUP OF THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN RIFLE VOLUNTEERS AT HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA.

DRAGON CUP OF THE ST. GEORGE'S RIFLE VOLUNTEER CORPS.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE anxiety to see Student and Robin Hood meet again after the Stockbridge dead heat, made a select company face the almost tropical heat on the July Stakes day. According to the betting, only these two were in the race, and so it proved; but Student was in trouble at the ends, and the handsome own brother to Buccaneer drew away from him and won as he liked. How Lord Portsmouth could have neglected to put a colt to Stockwell when breeding into the Derby and St. Leger is perfectly unaccountable; but Lord Zetland's Vedette has proved a fine one. On Wednesday "Robin" was first favourite for the Midsummer Stakes, and it would have required more midsummer madness to doubt his winning. Accordingly 9 to 2 was laid on him, but he was defeated cleverly by the Duke of Beaufort's Mr. Pitt, who ran very fast for the same distance—half a mile—at Stockbridge. "Robin's" friends vowed that "a short cut" is not his forte, and it may safely be added that three races on each day in round will be more than enough for a horse with native stock. The Duke of Beaufort had, as Hotspur says, "his usual 100 or so at a price which averaged 9 to 2." Most of the bookmakers left the Chesterfield Stakes to take care of itself, and winged their flight to Worcester; and it is also somewhat curious that the Stockbridge Meeting preceded their six o'clock express to London in his own special. The Cambridgeshire was attended by upwards of thirty horses. Old Caller On appeared again, and won the Queen's Plate in a canter, making, we believe, her thirty-second. The St. Leger betting may be said to be off; Ethnian has the call of Fille de l'Air on the Goodwood Cup; and the birth of an own sister to Gladiateur is announced at the Haras Borgo. Mr. Merry's Gladiateur colt has been sent over to Tattersalls' on Monday. It is said that Mr. Robert Smith may not improbably bring up his second string of Blair Athol's colts and fillies at the same spot in October, which will be a great point gained. He will have one or two of the sort to run for the Cesarewitch, and, indeed some horse attraction, as we hear that only one blood sire is entered for 2100 guns.

Englishmen, as their black brethren phrase it, "still keep running short in not to catch the fever." Accordingly, only 25 agreed to 18 at Broughton, and Carpenter 92 (not out) and Oxford has only to seat in two men, who got 25 between them, in order to beat Surrey in one innings. The great match of the season at Lord's on Our Queen's between the gentlemen and players. Although the latter did not play so many as seasons as they might have done, the Nottingham "Old Flaxet" had not stopped the way, still they were in great form, and T. Hearne* and J. Hampshire* (the latter has pushed up their pace score to 25), leaving the gentlemen (whose bowling was weak) 252 to win. Mr. Mitchell (of whom more anon) and Hodgson appear in this month's Bendy added 33 to his previous score of 38, and Mr. H. H. Walker was caught and bowled by Jupp* but still they failed by 116 at last. Although the Englebians fielded badly, they beat Marlborough by nine wickets. H. W. Verzie, 81 and 25 (not out), and the champion batter Bob Carpenter, 51 and 7. W. Neill made his Verelst was in equal form when the Rugby eleven met Charter House, and dispersed off them by 2 runs in one innings.

A silver pobbl, with 200 sovereigns in it, was presented, last week, to Charles Payne, on his having for nearly twenty years held the ball in been lead man for nineteen seasons. There were eighty subscribers; and his late name matter. Captain Osbaldeston was highly of his services during the season they had been together. George Rose has left the Rugby, and will be succeeded by a place has been taken by Richard Christian, late lieutenant to Mr. Hoare's, the what Yorkshire calls "Mr. Hill's still country." The streams in the north are becoming very pretty, and many of the pools had a good stock of fish. Accordingly, 14 guns, 1 rod, and 1 otter hound met at Mr. Neill made his Verelst was in equal form when the Rugby eleven met Charter House, and dispersed off them by 2 runs in one innings.

At the Henley Regatta, last week, the challenge cup for eight oars was borne off by the London Rowing Club, which beat the Cambridge Third Trinity and Eton College. The Third Trinity, however defeated the Radley crew for the latter honour, after a very close struggle on the part of the lads. The sailing-match of the second and third classes on the Royal London Yacht Club took place on Monday. The following contested:—Second class, 1 ton, Lucy, Lieut. Baldock and W. N. Rudge; Vampire, 20 tons, T. Cuthbert; Octoroon, 12 tons, T. H. Lancelle, 3; Camilla, 10 tons, Mr. Hall; Ione, Mr. Sikemi, 6 tons, Captain W. T. E. Rooksy; Algerine, 10 tons, F. A. Rossmar, Surprise, 8 tons, S. Harvey; Ariel, 10 tons, Mr. Hall. The Octoroon won the first prize, value thirty guineas; and Ione the second prize, value fifteen guineas. In first class Algerine won the first prize, value twenty guineas, and the Gipsy the second prize of fifteen guineas. In the second class of the third class belonging to the Royal Thames Yacht Club was sailed, on Tuesday, for prize value twenty sovs. Course—From Erith, round the Nore, and back to Erith. The following yachts started:—Cygnet, 20 tons, Mr. Cuthbert; Dudu, 15 tons, Captain Baldock and Mr. Rudge. The latter, however, had not a chance, as the prize was won by Vampire. The Corinthian match of the Royal Thames Yacht Club was sailed on Wednesday, for a piece of plate. Gather Thames, presented by Messrs. Herbert C. Mandeby and H. F. Smith, value fifty guineas. It was open to yachts of any size or tons and not exceeding thirty-five tons, belonging to any Royal yacht club, and manned by amateur crews. The following contested:—Dudu, 15 tons Captain Baldock and W. N. Rudge; Vampire, 20 tons, T. Cuthbert. The latter sailed easily.

The fanciers of swimming (of which 10,000 were present) had a great treat, between seven and eight a.m., on the Serpentine, last Monday. It was a fine trial of the powers of Boyton and Paul Boyton, the champion two-mile swimmer, against the breast-swimming of Cuthbert, who won the Prince's Plate last year. Cuthbert was about a foot the taller of the two, and six years older; but Gurr's fleet style, and herculean exertions gave him the victory, and the winner by two yards. The 1000 yards were done in 16 min. 33 sec., which is said to be the shortest time on record for still water.

THE FARM.

THE long-wished-for rain burst over the country on Thursday week, but, although it did much towards saving the turnips, the ground was so cracked and burnt up that it would have taken thrice twenty-four hours of it to make much impression on the pastures. Another short rain, which went like a waterspout for nearly half an hour on Saturday afternoon, fell "in the right place," and "in the right direction of remembrance," has rather helped the men of the south. However fastidious the anti-malt-tax men may consider the dear Parliament, it will be long remembered with gratitude for having at last given the Right Honourable Milner Gibson the chance to bring his anti-free trade and the succession duty. At the wool markets, last week, the quotations were unchanged, but the sales were large, owing to the arrival of the Liverpool telegrammas, and then they were glad to take 20s. Gardener's Edinburgh Circular of June 30 speaks of a great business in white wools:—"At the Newcastle wools keenly sought after, &c." On crosses, bred, and half bred, an advance of fully 2s. to 3s. per stone has been realised, and the sales have been large." As to the cotton became so confirmed, the sales slackened immensely. The Liverpool quotations were—"At the end of May" 17¼d. to 17¾d.; "at the beggs, from Caithness, which has long been pre-eminent for its wool. The Lincoln Fair was held on the 26th, but the returns of the local members were elected. The entry list for the Inverness meeting is well filled, and it has been decided to hold the 1863 meeting of the society at Aberdeen. It has been generally thought the damage was too remote, but damages to the amount of £20 have just been awarded to a farmer who was run over by the express train at Birmingham, and putting them out of show condition thereby. The Duke of Hamilton better pleased with the last cross he made at Plymouth.

The Duke of Hamilton has, it is said, sold his Stirling first-prize Ayrshire cow to a Swedish gentleman for £180; but this is, after all, not to be named with the £1000 which Mr. Bell paid for his Cully Hill at Battersea. Captain Gunter, judging from Willis's Room sale, has not succeeded in regaining the prestige of his father. The prices for his Duchess 84th and her heifer calf, some three or four months since, as the latter was just rudimentally put on to the Second Duke of Wharfedale. G.and Duke 13th it at Wetherby. He is not to be used in the herd; but, if the rheumatism in his knees, which has been the dread afraid of him, will let him (and he can be got to look as seems great hope), he will be most valuable to it.

The Duke of Richmond's sale of his fine old race horse pairs was greatly strengthened by Means, J. and F. Howard's Essex bays and chestnuts, which were all sold at remunerative prices. The first, a brother Claret, once "from Clifton bins," but now the property of Messrs. Lay, Sedley Selma Spencer and Grace Howard being second and third. Mr. Lynn's Pride took the Town Cup, for which Claret did not oppose her, and Mr. Sedley's Selma Spencer won the cup at Oxford Down from the latter turn were, as usual, in great form, Mr. Sedley's Selma Spencer won the cup at Oxford Down from the latter turn were, as usual, in great form, as it has been at other meetings of the Suffolk Agricultural Association, which, with the exception of a somewhat thin show of Shorthorns, was fully up to the average. The Prince of Wales and the Emperor was beaten by Tatton Emperor. Ace of Clubs and Cleopatra were afraid of her, and the latter was beaten by Mr. Howard took the cob-size prize with a very good one. Evening Star. Lady Sophia Sutherland's Shetland ponies were also in force, and Messrs. Mr. T. Brown and Mr. Aylmer each won a first long-wolled cup prize; and Mr. Sexton took eight first and second pig prizes against Mr. Skeene's five. Mr. Sexton is the only exhibitor from Northampton-shire shows. The Hon. Colonel Pennant's Duke of Geneva (10,014) was the only Shorthorn exhibited. Mr. Jonas Webb and Mr. Beasley's Second Duke of Aosta beat the ten-year-old Shorthorn bull Duke of Oxford. Mr. Jonas Webb's Perfume was first among the three-year-old heifers; but Captain Oliver was too much for him with Cleopatra, who was also first in the class for Cannabella, by Seventh Grand Duke from a Booth's Vaisaco cow. Mr. Jonas Webb's Duke of Oxford was first among the aged bulls of a Cotheestone horse; and Mr. George Lynes of Preston Deanery took a first with the two-year-old hunting-colt Dovid, by King David from a Mr. Jonas Webb's Duke of Oxford was first among the aged bulls of a Cotheestone horse; and Mr. George Lynes of Preston Deanery took a first with the two-year-old hunting-colt Dovid, by King David from a mare by Sir Hercules. The mare of the old match stock were next to the winners in their classes.

STATUE OF THE LATE SIR CHARLES BARRY.

THE statue we have engraved was a short time back placed in the inner hall of the New Palace of Westminster, but the ceremony of "uncovering" did not take place till Saturday last. It was generally felt, on the lamented and untimely death of Sir Charles Barry, that a memorial to him should be placed in the great building he designed and to the erection of which he devoted the best energies and the best years of his life. Accordingly, a subscription was set on foot by the Royal Institute of British Architects; sufficient funds were soon raised, and the commission was given to Mr. J. H. Foley, R.A., an artist now admitted to be—if we except Mr. Gibson—the first of British sculptors. The result is in every way satisfactory. Of the merit of the statue it will suffice to say that it is one of Mr. Foley's best works. Our Engraving may perhaps give some idea of the "motif," which is that of the architect seated, deeply absorbed, designing the Palace of Westminster. Having drawn the plan of the palace on the paper before him, the idea of the Victoria tower strikes him, and this he has just sketched as a marginal note. He then holds the drawing-board at arm's length, to judge the effect of his work. This excellent conception the sculptor has carried out with a lifelike truth of expression as well as character, a consentaneousness of the whole figure, and a degree of knowledge and skill in the modelling which are rarely seen conjoined in a contemporary work of British sculpture. The site the statue occupies is also a subject of congratulation. It is to be apprehended that during the life of Sir Charles Barry full justice was scarcely accorded to him by public opinion. To estimate rightly the relative measure of his success in the new Houses of Parliament we must try to realise the prevailing ignorance of every style of Gothic nearly thirty years ago, when his design for the palace was submitted in competition. Our surprise at the comparative purity and harmony of the design must be further increased when we reflect that Barry's own early studies had been pursued abroad, in Egypt, Greece, and Italy, and that his principal early works were in the Classical or Italian styles—as, for instance, the Manchester Athenæum, the Travellers' Club, the College of Surgeons, and the Reform Club. Opinions differ and will differ as to the suitability of the peculiar, and in detail minutely monotonous, form of English Gothic at Westminster for a building so extensive as the Palace of the British Legislature must necessarily be. Its proportions and internal arrangements may be still more open to criticism; and it has certainly proved singularly ill-adapted for the exhibition of the paintings with which its walls are decorated. Yet, after all, it must be admitted to be one of the most imposing structures in Europe. Barry did not live to see his great work completed; but he had the satisfaction of seeing its noblest external and internal features, the Victoria Tower and the Royal Gallery, opened by the Sovereign in state. But even now the public can form only an imperfect idea of the complete design of the architect, and must continue to do so until the buildings which he proposed are erected, and which will extend from the Clock Tower westward along Bridge-street, and around New Palace-yard, besides covering the site of the present hideously disorderly law-courts. As we write we have before us the plan and elevation of the proposed extension of the Palace (forming part of a return to an address of the House of Lords, dated June 13, 1856), and it appears to us that this extension comprises several of the most decidedly picturesque and varied characteristics of the whole design. A gigantic archway with very high-pitched roof, flanking turrets and spires, forming an angular entrance facing the north-west, to the court that is to be inclosed before Westminster Hall, will present a most effective mass seen from Parliament-street, while the continuation along St. Margaret-street is broken up into bolder masses than any of the other façades, and the promise of richer effects of light and shade thus afforded receives an additional guarantee from a massive, broad-arched, arcaded footway or cloister beneath. In this extension the principal entrance to the Palace would be a marked and important feature, and a degree of unity would replace the disjointed, incongruous character of the building on the land side. The architect's final plan included the removal of St. Margaret's Church, and of blocks of houses in New and Old Palace Yards; the houses in New Palace Yard, are already demolished.

THE ISLAND OF SOMBRERO.

OUR Engraving represents one of the Leeward Islands, in the Caribbean Sea, containing the richest natural deposit of phosphate of lime at present known. The island was first visited by an English gentleman about the year 1814, and again by him in 1825, on which latter occasion a report was made to the British Government, but did not meet with that consideration which subsequent events prove it to have deserved. In 1856 the Americans took possession of the island, and in the course of a very short time exported of the extent of 100,000 tons of this valuable fertiliser, to resuscitate the exhausted lands of the Southern States. Subsequently their proceedings attracted the attention of a British surveying expedition, at that time engaged in the West Indies, as may be learned from a communication to the Royal Agricultural Society of England, by Sir Roderick Murchison, who, in describing the geological structure of the island, says —"I have often regretted that I have never had it in my power to communicate anything of importance to the British farmer; I am now, however, enabled to make an announcement which will, I have no doubt, be as acceptable to agriculturists as it is likely to become very valuable to the merchant and shipowner." It appears that the Americans have already quarried away a considerable part of the island, and sold the substance in New York. This transaction led to an official correspondence between the British and American Governments, and eventually the right of the British Crown to the possession of this valuable property was acknowledged by the United States Government. Sir Roderick Murchison considers our holding the Island of Sombrero to be of great national importance, in providing our agricultural interest, at a moderate price, with a plentiful supply of a good substitute for the guano of Peru.

FINE ARTS.

CHURCH'S NEW PICTURES.

In even an inferior painter were to depict, from his own independent studies from nature, the most remarkable phenomena and the most stupendous scenery of the New World, literally from the Equator almost to the Pole, considerable interest would attach to his representations. But how much would that interest be deepened if the painter were an artist of great ability and originality! Mr. Church has evidently undertaken the gigantic task we have mentioned hypothetically, and he brings to its execution the technical power and freshness of perception necessary to its worthy accomplishment. Moreover, we have here the actual realisation of being the productions of an artist generally esteemed at the first of American landscape painters. Already instalments of Mr. Church's new works have been exhibited in London—namely, the great pictures of "Niagara," "The Heart of the Andes," and "The Andes of Ecuador." And now we have to announce the appearance of three important additions, at present on view at M'Lean's Gallery, in Haymarket. These pictures are the "Aurora Borealis," as seen near the Pole; "Chimborazo," the monarch of American mountains; and "Cotopaxi," the highest of the huge Andean volcanoes.

The picture of the Northern Lights was painted partly from Mr. Church's own experience while collecting material off Labrador for his "Iceberg," and partly from the sketches of Dr. Hayes, the latest American explorer, and a pupil of Mr. Church. The scene represented is said to be the nearest point yet reached to the Pole. Behind a scarped basaltic promontory rises a pyramidal iceberg, discovered by Dr. Hayes "Church's Peak." The colossus of that explorer lies imbedded in the floe of the desolate, ice-bound sea, and wedged round with hummocks; the red fire-light from its deck-house windows forming a weird contrast to the dull blue of the moonlight on the long Arctic night, and the spectral iridescence of the aurora, which, while it spreads a veil of ever-changeful and shifting light before the stars, seems to embody but hardly dim those latent influences. It appears that the aurora in these high latitudes does not arise sheer from the horizon, but from a segment of undiscovered space. The fact is inferred from this that at the Pole it would present to the astonished gaze a vast ring of pyramidal fire, with the Pole for the focal point of view it is an immense low or arch, definite in its lower or concentric boundary, "indefinite" in its circumference, or an enormous altitude. In this arch luminous prismatic colours have a broad, serrated, waving, flaming band of phantasmal green, and there streaks and scintillant points of pale rose and gold and amaranth dance and play, expand and coruscate like fairy distortions of web and woof as if under the influence of mystical music unseen and of unequal power darting upwards with inconceivable rapidity. The beauty, however, the wonder and awe of the phenomena are beyond written description; and great praise is due to the painter for enabling us to realise it beyond the power of words. We also see in this felicity with which he has suggested its dancing and playful movements.

In the strongest contrast with the preceding picture is that of the two Equatorial subjects on the opposite wall. The view of Chimborazo is from the Guayaquil River, Ecuador. The rich, fertile foreground among lovely little islets, and through a wide alluvial valley, clothed with the truckles forests and the luxuriant undergrowth tangled together with tropical vines, is treated with what seems scarcely a glimpse of human occupation or habitation save the fisherman's floating raft-like moored to the shore in the left. Stretching along the middle distance beyond the valley, gleaming orange and pink in the afternoon sun, and with pale purple and blue shadows, and rising from the dazzling white mists at their feet, stand the vast, a wonderful look of reality, the lower zone of mountains called the Cordilleras. High over all, a hundred miles away, soars, mantled in evanescent vision, the supreme peak of Chimborazo, its sloping skirts quite lost in the blue of the lower denser atmospheric strata.

The picture of "Cotopaxi" is still more impressive, though the great altitude of the volcano is comparatively lost in that of the group to which it belongs. The painter is supposed to stand on the Hacienda or pyrame, about 8000ft. above the level of the sea, and which is sparsely covered with grass and shrubs and interspersed with the rich emerald of the rainy season. A lake filled from one of the chasms due to volcanic action occupies the centre of the foreground, and finds an outlet in clifts and fissures of the limestone rocks in the foreground, down which it tumbles in cascades and waterfalls. Above the general level of the middle distance the snowy cone of Cotopaxi lifts itself dark against the morning sky at a distance of about fifty miles. From the mouth of the crater below the snow-line rises (otherwise perhaps passed by explosions) lofty volumes of black smoke, which, rising slowly and majestically, roll and swell, and, becoming gradually diffused, are carried by the trail of the eye can reach, staining the sky a lurid, and darking over the whole landscape. The whole effect of these huge volumes of volcanic smoke and ashes the sun is seen behind them, and is but portrayed—the picture is painted in the noblest hide, which seems to glow like lava or molten copper. A space of clear morning sky, flecked with a few white clouds of the utmost purity and brightness, forms a most telling contrast to the obscured portion of the heavens.

These remarkable pictures are known to have been painted from many separate studies, and they present internal evidence of the fact. Hence much of their interest and value as works of art, despite deficiencies. The principle upon which they were executed, though perfectly legitimate, and one to be commended for realistic effect, is, to her sister, Poetry, is of perilous application to works so realistic in detail as these under notice. In the picture of Cotopaxi, for instance, a tensive typical character, which could hardly be found in any direct transcript from one particular point of view. A still higher degree of certain discordant and made-up appearance in the foregrounds of both the Chimborazo and the Cotopaxi. The distances, also, and all those passages which have been painted from a single impression are admirable in the extreme. But the foregrounds seem to have been composed in the artist's studio in New York, and, although highly elaborated and carefully studied in detail, they are, in the result, "feeling" always recognisable in work directly inspired by nature, they betray a lower degree of artistic excellence than the rest, and, besides, somewhat mechanical in execution. Some pictures of Rosador scenery lately exhibited by Mr. Danby, R.A., were open to the technical "quality," much greater unity, and, we should imagine, more legal colour; and yet they were not, Mr. Church's pictures belong, we should say, to the highest kind of intellectual and scientific—to definable—art, and not to that which is more comprehending grasp of or plastic control over nature. Nor can we admit that the painter has an unquestionable historical or special faculty in art that makes rules unto itself—such, for instance, as Turner's. Our American friends tell us that a picture of Church's exhibited between two Turners in New York has a damaging effect on the latter. But, supposing the Turners are fine and in good condition, a comparison between the two can hardly be instituted in fairness to either—certainly not to Mr. Church. The aims of the two painters are widely dissimilar; and the difference between them is one not only in degree, but in kind. We have said that Mr. Church is original; and his method appears eminently so when we think of the worn-out conventionalisms of the ordinary run of our contemporary landscape-painters. But those familiar with the productions of the Dusseldorf school will easily recognise conventionalisms of that school, mediately through the Dusseldorf Gallery in the Broadway, New York, in the present landscapes. The character of painting common in the German school, though at length disappearing, to which we allude is, however, far more conspicuous in a heavily and coarsely-painted picture, also in the Haymarket Gallery, of "A Bison at Bay," by Mr. Hayes, another American artist. We trust we shall not appear grudging in the expression of our admiration of Mr. Church's pictures when we say that they are somewhat too much in a mannered. Let us say, in conclusion, that we think them peculiarly interesting, deserving careful study, and entitled to respectful admiration. Above all, they present, both in selection of subjects and in fresh power of execution, a worthy basis for anticipation during this great exhibition of the existence of a vigorous and comparatively independent school of American landscape-painting.

MUSIC.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

LAST week we gave some account of the preliminary arrangements for the Handel Festival at Crystal Palace, and we have now to notice the principal occurrences during this great celebration. As has been already mentioned, there were three public performances—on Monday, June 30; Wednesday, June 25; and Friday, June 27—the first consisting of "The Messiah," the second of a selection from several of Handel's oratorios and other works, and the third of "Israel in Egypt."

The performance of "The Messiah" did not differ much from previous performances of the same work at the Crystal Palace, especially that which took place at the festival of 1857. The chief difference lay in the increased number of performers and the enhanced musical band, which was greater than it had ever been before. The chorus consisted of nearly 3000 voices, and the orchestra numbered about 400, the whole tuneful host exceeding 4000—a number unprecedented in the annals of modern music, and not likely to be surpassed soon. Mdlle. Adelina Patti, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Santley. The choruses were sung with a power and grandeur which showed the success of the efforts to raise choral singing to a degree of excellence never before attained. All the skilful training endeavours made to improve the great Handel orchestra and the arcs of the central trussed as a field locality, and the whole of the parts together with the full scales bestowed in instructing and training the choristers by means of the sight-reading classes, which have been established since the last festival, have contributed to bring about this result; and the splendid effects produced by the "Hallelujah" chorus will not be surpassed by those produced now. The great choruses, "For unto us a child is born," "Behold the Lamb of God," and, above all, the stupendous "Hallelujah," were clothed with a sublimity beyond the power of language to describe. The solo singing, however, though not inferior in point of talent, was much below the mark in effect. The attempt to perform the music of Handel in the area of the Crystal Palace, though a mere experiment, has proved a failure, and it will not, we think, have been successful in solo singing. It seems to be beyond the power of any single voice, however fine, to fill the area of the nave and transepts unless it is strained to such a degree as to destroy the delicacy, grace, and expression of the singing. Even the voice of Mdlle. Patti, powerful as it seemed, in order to make themselves heard in such a place. If our previous suggestion be carried out, and the solos be sung by a weak but effective compound to what they are in Exeter Hall, everybody knows that the fault is none of theirs. The audience make allowance for the fact that the music was sung in the "wrong" key, and actually doing, but for what they are well known to be able to do in a more suitable position. Nevertheless, the fine, rich, sympathetic voices, and those of the most clear and penetrating quality, were the most successful in the solo performances. Mdlle. Patti's voice was not audible beyond a narrow space, and three fourths of the audience might just as well have been at home for all the effect she produced. Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington was also heard to disadvantage. Such was the case, not only in the performance of "The Messiah," but also in the selection from Handel's oratorios. The nature of the Crystal Palace as a musical locality have not yet been surmounted; but, considering how much has been already accomplished in this respect, we have little doubt where another festival now may not yet be done.

The performance of Wednesday was a selection from "Saul," "Samson," "Solomon," "Judas Maccabæus," and "Acis and Galatea," together with the coronation anthem, "Zadok the Priest," the day being the anniversary of the coronation of Queen Victoria. The selection was judiciously made, and was calculated to interest, in light and varied entertainment; but it could hardly have been satisfactory to those who took more serious views of the subject of view. At our great national festivals the introduction of "selections" has been a mere concession to the taste of the public. The Handel Festival confined performance, consisting of things jumbled together without coherence or congruity. The effect of the various pieces is injured by separating them from their proper place; the whole selection of an air or a chorus, in relation to what goes before or after, being often an important factor in the performance. The result is a monstrous and incoherence there were many instances which must have been obvious to all but the most unthinking. Taking this view of the case into consideration, the performance contained many grand and beautiful things, such as "Let the bright seraphim," sung by Mdme. Dolby, with Miss Hounsell and Mr. Cummings as the chorus, and "Let their celestial concerts all unite." From "Acis and Galatea" the pieces selected were "Love in her eyes sits playing," sung by O'Leary, whose merits numberless," admirably sung by Mdme. Dolby, whose power of sustaining her voice enabled her to be comparatively singing); and "Mourn all ye muses," by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, one of the greatest efforts of Handel's genius; and the famous "Hand Music," which was given with all the force and the most solemn and effecting funeral marches in existence. The selection from "Samson" was the air, "Let the bright seraphim," admirably sung by Mr. Santley; "Let the bright seraphim," sung by Mdlle. Patti

Mike's box, containing correspondence between him and Dashwood and evidence of Ruth's family and her right to great wealth. These are found by Jem, who makes confusion of them, and it is not till time Joe and Ruth have understood each other, and it is discovered that Kit Coventry is her long-lost brother. Incidents like these are, of course, artificial, and, on the stage, wholly conventional; but they are convenient to the ordinary playwright and constantly used. In other respects the drama is excellent; moreover, it is excellently acted.

At the Olympic, the new drama is by Mr. Tom Taylor. It is entitled "The Serf; or, Love Levels All." Though bearing some resemblance to the piece produced under the same title at Covent Garden, it is really original, though in all probability founded on a novel-story. There is an immense amount of scenery required for the new drama, and the action occupies an extensive area, both in space and time. It commences in Paris and ends in Russia. The Serf is of Russian birth and is seen by us first as Paul; but, after being educated and maintained as a gentleman, so that he becomes a great artist and obtains the love of a Countess (Miss Fanny Kate Terry). This heroine has certain aristocratic notions, which render serfdom odious to her, and Paul, who loves her, therefore sheet us to his origin. But the lady cannot be kept in this blissful state of ignorance, and her circumstances soon place her and him in painful relations with each other. The Countess is assaulted at the Opera by a Russian nobleman, Prince Ivan (Mr. H. Neville), and rescued by Ivan, who throws the aggressor from the grand tier into the orchestra. Satisfaction is afterwards demanded of Ivan, who vocally is the loudest (but the arrival of another combatant (Mr. R. Wigan), alters the complexion of affairs. The Count, seeing that he accepted it a set challenge to fight, and that Ivan was a stranger from the Countess, consents to tender an apology, which would naturally have the effect of making her despise him for a coward; but the thoroughly understands the whole matter, though prudently she conceals her feelings. To redeem himself, Ivan leaves his native country for Russia to claim his promised freedom from his lord, but on his arrival discovers not only that the latter is dead, but that Ivan is that lord's master. Horror-struck; for Ivan is reduced to his servile condition, and afterwards, for participating in a revolt of the serfs, is located in the prisons of the Countess. Her estate, on the Volga (a valley), also is subject to outrage, and the final deed so infuriates Ivan to a riot that a chiefly strong cause has been given for the serfs' revolt, other dangers are near. The palace is undermined, and old Kher is about to fire the train; but, as the Countess and Ivan escape, Ivan endeavours to prevent him, and the latter is slain. In his dying speech he reveals that many years ago he (Kher) had stolen the true heir to the estate, but had saved the younger brother, who was none other than Paul, who therefore is justly entitled to the property. The peril which the Countess and Ivan are in from the expected explosion removes all restraint from the lady, who declares her love for Paul, and of her love she is willing to die with him. Here are powerful sources of emotion, and the scenes are strongly cast and richly coloured. Miss Terry's acting is commanding. Mr. Neville's portrait is especially elaborate and the costumes particularly picturesque. The appliance of the invention of the drama is excellent, and promises a prolonged success.

On Saturday the new actor from America appeared at the New Adelphi, in an American play and an American character. Mr. Owens then, for the first time, presented himself before the British public, and produced a new drama, entitled "Solon Shingle." He here is an American farmer who, in paying a visit to an American village, makes himself at home everywhere, and is the occasion a familiarity so free and easy that he scarcely recognises any distinction between mean and base. The circumstances are commonplace and the character are very striking and novel; the make-up is admirable. The old man fondles about, and interferes in every thing, introduces himself into a merchant's store at a late hour in the evening, and even into the Court of Justice, standing up on a chair to see and hear all which he had nothing to do. In these different situations he spins a variety of yarns, in which the most is made of nothing, the peculiarities of character being brought out by minute touches, and not by any importance but as they illustrate an individuality. Altogether, this is a remarkable performance, and may last as a stock piece.

Mr. Creswick commenced a starring engagement on Monday at the City of London, in the character of Hamlet. He was hailed on his first appearance with a hearty welcome, and retained the best attributes of his former performance. The act is to be deemed, concerned, and finished by the 31st of December, 1865, and not after.

THE LATE COLONEL PATRICK STEWART, R.E.

As a fitting accompaniment to our Illustrations of the laying of the Indo-European Telegraph to the head of the Persian Gulf, where it joins the land line constructed through Persia and Asiatic Turkey, we give a Portrait of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Patrick Stewart, a most able and active officer of the Royal Engineers, to whose personal exertions, as managing Director-General of this great undertaking, the success of its operations is in a great measure to be ascribed. This highly-promising and already most distinguished member of the scientific branch of our military service died at Constantinople at the beginning of this year, having just accomplished the most difficult part of his task by the completion of the telegraphic line from Baghdad to Bushire. He was only thirty-two years of age, but had run a very brilliant career. At the College of Addiscombe he won the good-conduct prize, a sword with inscription, the Pollock gold medal, and the first Engineers' appointment for the term, as being the best conducted and most proficient of the cadets in his year. He was the first who ever combined, in his own person, these academical distinctions. Having gone out to India, his scientific attainments and activity recommended him for various employments, in which he won golden opinions from his superiors; and when the mutiny broke out he was attached to the Telegraph Department, which, under Sir W. O'Shaughnessy, was then spreading its branches all over India. He was specially appointed to keep the column under Sir Colin Campbell in communication with the Government during the advance upon Lucknow, and he served throughout the first advance, the second advance, the siege, and subsequent operations in Oude under Lord Clyde, always displaying the same coolness, courage, and zeal which made him conspicuous even in such a gallant and distinguished corps as the Bengal Engineers. He was the first who ever marked the successive days' progress of an army by telegraph posts and stations, and his escapes from the enemy's horse were numberless; but nothing could daunt his spirit of enterprise and energy. Lord Canning, Lord Clyde, Sir James Outram—all those, in fact, who could appreciate devotion to duty, fearlessness, skill, and modesty—regarded him as one of the most rising officers in the Army. On his return to England he was favourably received; and corroborated, by his aptitude for affairs and extraordinary intelligence, the impression produced on those who recommended him to the notice of the authorities at home. He was eventually selected to superintend the construction of the telegraphic route to India, and left England, at the close of 1863, for the purpose of laying the Indo-European sea-cable along the coast of Beloochistan and Persia. He successfully escorted his important charge up to the head of the Persian Gulf, at Fao, reaching the shores of Turkish Arabia in a few weeks after leaving Kurrachee, and then moved up to Baghdad to see what was the prospect of ensuring an efficient communication to and from that city. Unfortunately, though the Ottoman Government had agreed to bring their land line to the Persian Gulf, at the mouth of the Shat-ul-Arab, in time to meet the Indian sea-cable, it was found, on the arrival of the latter, that a gap of 170 miles of the Turkish section still remained unfinished between Baghdad and Bussora. Nor was there a promise even of speedy completion. The Turks wished to put up the line; the Arabs would not let them. The matter would have been trivial to a Power like England; it was a long-standing obstacle in Turkish Asia. We should have subsidised the rebellious Montesbs into guardians of the line. The obstinacy of a Turkish Pacha made them his bitter enemies, and consequently hostile to the telegraph which he wished to erect. Under these circumstances Colonel Stewart returned to India from Bagdad in April, 1864. After making his arrangements in Bombay he embarked for Egypt and Constantinople, landing at Galata in July. From that time to the period of his death he was constantly engaged in urging the Ottoman authorities to organise at least one thoroughly efficient wire for the Anglo-Indian telegraph service. In the first instance his attention was given to certain amendments in their Asiatic lines, inspected and re-inspected by British officers; to placing a competent staff of clerks and signallers along the line sufficiently acquainted with English to prevent a recurrence of the absurd mistakes heretofore committed by the misuse of that language and incorrect translations; and to framing a full convention with the Turkish Government which would meet all future requirements on the subject of international telegraph communication. It then appeared that, while perfecting the Asiatic system, there was danger of deterioration on the European side. Attention was consequently drawn to the Danubian and Adriatic lines of Turkey. But Colonel Stewart's energy and perseverance at length prevailed over the apathy of the Turkish officials, and the whole system was put into a good working condition. He had an able assistant in Major Champain, a brother officer of Engineers. This gentleman has held charge of the Persian line of telegraph, which, branching off from the Turkish line at Bagdad, takes a long course to the Persian Gulf through Teheran, and joins the Indian Sea cable at Bushire. The completion of this alternative line would render the failure between Bagdad and Bussora of comparatively little importance; for the correspondence would then have effect from Constantinople to Bagdad, from Bagdad to Bushire, and from Bushire, by submarine cable, to Gwadur or Kurrachee, at each of which places is a terminus of the Indian system. The rest was a political battle, which the director of the Anglo-Indian Telegraph was hardly called upon to fight. Colonel Stewart, however, did fight it, in conjunction with our diplomatists; but in serving the State as a true and loyal soldier, at the desk as in the field, he overtaxed his energies. Sharp and severe Indian sicknesses, constant warnings of danger from fevers which pursued him to Europe, and daily increasing sensitiveness to matters of duty, were reasons for a relaxation of labour. He had not been well for many weeks; but he could not be persuaded to quit Constantinople, which he seemed to consider for the time the post of honour. It was, in fact, the central point for a joint European and Asiatic line on the eve of completion, and especially favourable for watching and correcting defects when once the working had begun. Besides, the mal-administration of Turkish telegraphs called for the closest observation and care in the early operations of the Indian line. He had at length made up his mind to leave the place, but must delay for one more interview at the Porte to obtain some further concessions. This interview, though a day had been fixed, never took place. About Christmas he was seriously ill. On the 26th of December his malady assumed the form of cerebral affection; an intermittent fever supervened, followed by a complication of disorders. He died on the 16th of January, and now rests in Scutari about fifty yards from the monument to the Crimean heroes.

THE LATE LIEUTENANT-COLONEL PATRICK STEWART, DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE INDO-EUROPEAN TELEGRAPH.

THE INDO-EUROPEAN TELEGRAPH: MUSSENDOM STATION, ELPHINSTONE INLET, PERSIAN GULF.

THE INDO-EUROPEAN TELEGRAPH.

A DESCRIPTION of the manufacture of the great Indian submarine cable, with illustrations of its shipment from the factory at Woolwich and of portions of the land line along the coast of Beloochistan connecting the cable with Kurrachee, appeared in our Impression of Sept. 19, 1863. Since then the whole of the line has been completed, and public messages are being daily flashed between all parts of the civilized world and the chief cities of our Indian empire. A glance at the map will show that a line drawn directly from England to India passes through Turkey and the Persian Gulf, and by this route the Government of India determined to carry a line of telegraph, partly by land, partly by sea, after the attempt to establish communication by way of the Red Sea had resulted in the failure which will be fresh in the recollection of our readers. With this view, after surveys of the Mekran coast by Colonel Goldsmid, the late Colonel Patrick Stewart was dispatched from India to Persia to report upon the practicability of constructing land lines through Persia and Mesopotamia, to join a submarine cable to be laid from the head of the gulf to the junction with the line at Gwadur; and on his arrival in England steps were taken for carrying out these lines under his direction, aided by the well-known telegraphic engineers, Sir Charles Bright and Mr. Latimer Clarke.

The chief importance of the work was centred in the manufacture and laying of the enormous mass of cable, nearly 1500 miles in length, and weighing upwards of 5000 tons, which was constructed under the careful supervision of the engineers, at the works of the Gutta-Percha Company, in the City-road; and by Messrs. Henley, at North Woolwich. A description of the cable, which embodied several novel features of great utility, and of its manufacture, has already appeared in our columns. It was coiled into large iron water-tanks on board the ship ASSAYE, Tweed, Marian Moore, Kirkham, Caspatrick, and Amberwitch; and the fleet arrived in Bombay in due course. As soon as permits for the laying of the cable being commenced at Gwadur, from the Kirkham, under the superintendence of Mr. Latimer Clarke, assisted by Messrs. Lawe, Webb, Lambert, and other members of the engineering staff, on the 3rd of February, last year.

The first section from Gwadur to Mussendom, a barren promontory at the entrance to the Persian Gulf, on the Arabian side, was completed in the course of the month—a station being established upon an island in Elphinstone Inlet, long the resort of the "Arabian Arab craft which used to infest the Persian Gulf until we replaced in the charge of the Indian Navy, now the busy transmitting station of the telegraph to India.

Our two Illustrations of the inlet and the Mussendom station, which are taken from sketches by Mr. Latimer Clarke, present a sun-baut Clyde, show the boldness of the scenery in the neighbourhood of the inlet, which extends in a winding channel for a mile from the entrance. On the island is the station, supplied with all the requirements of a first-class telegraphic station, which are those of every telegraphic apparatus by Messrs. Siemens. There are, in addition, comfortable buildings for the superintendent, who resides here, as in other stations on the line, from among the best operators on the staff of the telegraph companies here. The usual crowd of native servants essential to European life in such a climate has also their quarters here, so that there is no monotony at the station from the lack of human life. Books are provided for evenings and amusements, and the daily supply of English periodicals and newspapers. Two hulks are also fitted up for the staff to live on board whenever a change of air or island is preferred. Thus, with plenty of work and occasional visits from the engineer employed in charge of the cable, to take charge of or repairing the cable in cast of need, the time passes away very quickly at Mussendom.

On the 25th of March the section between Mussendom and Bushire was completed, and on the 5th of April the communication between Karachee and the head of the gulf was open. The cable passes from Mussendom and the head of the Persian Gulf, where we have, as in other stations on the line, from among the best operators on the staff of the telegraph companies here. SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

The Philosophical Magazine for July begins with a paper, by Mr. T. R. Edmonds, on the law of the density of saturated steam, including tables of results. This is followed by a note, from Professor W. A. Miller, on chemical nomenclature, the reformation of which he thinks practicable at the present time, and very desirable, in order that it may be more in harmony with the advanced state of our knowledge. He gives suggestions connected with the old names, showing how much more precision may be obtained by the change. By a letter from the Astronomer Royal we regret to learn that he is subject occasionally to slight attacks of hemiopey. He considers the subject scientifically, and gives an account of the singular forms of lines perceived by him. Professor Schröder van der Kolk's memoir contains his experimental researches on the laws of the refraction and dispersion of gases and vapours. Mr. Spottiswoode has a paper on Transversal and mathematical papers by Professor Cayley, Dr. Thomas Weeks, and Mr. Alfred H. Curtis, followed by extracts from the Proceedings of the Royal Society and other learned bodies.

At the concluding meeting of the Geological Society for this session a paper was read by H. Goodeve Seeley, on the fossil remains of seals of the valley of Colemore, which are shown to have a thickness of from 1700 to 2000 feet. The remains are those of seals, some of which are of a species new to science, while others are identical with existing European and American species, with a few novelties. At the same meeting a paper was read by Messrs. W. Boyd Dawkins, E. Wood, and G. R. Roberts, on some mammalian remains found by Mr. Wood, near Richmond, Yorkshire, last summer, on a terrace of blue clay, mixed with limestone debris, about 130 ft. above the north bank of the River Swale during excavations for a sewer. The deposit was stated to be a heap of kitchen refuse, and the great majority of the bones, except the solid and marrowless are broken; and not one of the skulls is perfect. The remains consisted of those of the red deer, sheep, ox, hedgehog, and the horn-cores of a third form of bi-gent. The bones of the ox and sheep are those of the small variety usually found at the dwellings of the Romano-British period. The remains of the hedgehog, and the other fauna that are the result of hybridity, and stated that they have found the bones of the ox and sheep in the Romano-British deposits of every part of the country.

M. Pasteur has reported to the Academy of Sciences some further results of his investigations into the chemistry of wine, in a note on the acetic fermentation of wine, which are found to be of a high order, which is well known, is due to the crystals of bitartrate of potash, or acetrol, which are found in the wine. M. Pasteur has found that the wine is not the only source of the acetic fermentation, but the vessels, the vessels, and the cooper's hoop. In the second kind of deposit, often confounded with the preceding, but which is distinguished from it by its greater solubility in water, and by the fact that the sides of the bottle, particularly the side next the soil on which it is laid. This deposit must not be confounded with the first, which is crystalline, and of another class that of granulations resembling organized cellules, almost perfectly spherical. M. Pasteur has found that the ferment-cells of the first kind of deposit, which is very troublesome and dangerous, is formed by cryptogamic fermentation. The most important observation contained in the observation of wine we refer to his note in the Comptes Rendus, vol. 60, No. 22.

M. Jeffreys Wyman has reported to the Boston Society of Natural History the results of his investigations into the anatomy and the development of the Amœba. The species in question appeared in some fibrine, which had been left in a glass vessel with water. He has been in the process of watching the progress of its decomposition on water. The Amœbæ were then apparently in a state of rest, and had assumed the form of a nearly spherical change of form or structure. As soon under the microscope, they appeared to be in a state of rest, and had assumed the form of a nearly spherical mass. In the course of the experiment which he was engaged in, he found that the circumference of the organism was wholly free. Solid bodies, lodged in the interior, were seen to be carried about in currents, and, as a rule, the movements seeming to meet with little or no obstruction; and yet no opening was discovered in the body. The Amœbæ, he found, multiplied by the fact that after the sarcode was pushed out before it, becoming more and more prominent outwards, and at last the whole body divided into two, corresponding parts. The Amœba, in one instance, underwent complete spontaneous division in five minutes, and in another in ten minutes. Besides, he found, the primary masses needed from each other, the band which united them became thinner and thinner, and finally broke, leaving the two masses entirely separate. In the latter case, the division was not so rapid, and the two masses remained connected by a band of sarcode for some time. The Amœba never increases in size after the division had become nearly complete, as just described; but the two masses, after separation, commence growing immediately, and soon attain to the renewed their original shape. From the manner in which solid particles are thrown from the interior to the surface, and from the manner organisms become subdivided, it is reasonable to infer that they have no proper digestive organs, and that nutrition is effected by simple imbibition.

M. Boussingault reported the result of his very interesting researches on the action of carbonic acid on vegetation before the Academy of Sciences at Paris. Hitherto carbonic acid has been considered to be the only source of the carbon of vegetables. M. Boussingault, however, has recently experimented with the view of ascertaining whether carbonic acid alone is essential to vegetation. He has found that in addition to the presence of oxygen is necessary for the accomplishment of this phenomenon of reduction. Experiments were made with plants placed in glass jars, which had assigned a proportion of eight of carbonic acid gas and ninety-two of oxygen as a constituent of atmosphere. M. Boussingault, in 1860, and 1861, however, experimented with the entire plant, leaves and roots. Now, as the actions of leaves and roots are quite distinct, and even opposite, in their phenomena, M. Boussingault pursued his researches in this direction, and has determined that the roots of plants, in the absence of carbonic acid, decomposed the water with the nitrogen, and that the mineral plants oxygen and nitrogen, produce exactly the same effect. Hence he concludes (1) that leaves placed in the dark, and roots in the presence of pure oxygen, do not decompose this gas; (2) that leaves in the sunshine placed in carbonic acid and water with oxygen, or with nitrogen, decompose the water with which they are in composition. He derives other consequences from his experiments. Plants, he says, do not live on humus, but they can live on the gases which united with nitrogen or hydrogen.

The new number of the Journal of the Linnean Society is principally composed of Mr. Darwin's paper, or rather treatise (in 118 pages), on the various contrivances by which orchids are fertilized by insects, and on the good effects of cross-breeding. The paper, in order, specially-twining plants, leaf climbers, and tendril-bearers. The first species of Orchis observed is O. mascula:—"It has often been vaguely asserted that plants are distinguished from animals by the power of motion. But in the tendrils of climbing plants we have plants acquire and display this power only when it is of some advantage to them. The stem first spontaneously bends towards every point of the compass, and feel is brought to them by the wind and rain. We see how high in the vegetable kingdom this power of movement first appears in the common tendril bearers. If it also plays a part in the fertilization of flowers, a supposition which will be considered in the following chapters, it is evidently of the highest use." It is also of use to the plant, and tends to vigour of frame, if it disregards it, whatever may be used advantageous. During several days the tendrils of a vine, which had not unpleasantly revolve with a slow motion, the tendril strikes one object, and quickly coils round and firmly grasps it; in the same manner as the tendril of a Bignonia, which has caught a twig, and forming an excellent spring. All movements now cease. By growth the tendril soon becomes thicker and stronger, and "this is the work of the plant, and done it in an admirable manner." This number also contains the Presidential address of Mr. George Bentham, and the obituary notice, by Mr. George Bentham, the president of the society, relating to the preservation of the Linnean collection of plants, and the Linnean herbarium, and the Linnean library, and the Linnean museum of natural history, which has been consequently given for planting the germinating nuts, &c. We are glad to learn that a new and improved edition of Loudon's "Arboretum et Fruticetum" is in course of publication.

Dr. Pohson has presented to the Academy of Sciences at Paris an account of his researches in regard to the action of the metalloids upon the phosphates of lime, and has successfully revived the old experiment. He found that ordinary glass is coloured yellow by the admixture of carbon, sulphur, silicium, phosphorus, and arsenic, and that the glass of the common carbuncle sulphates; that the glass exempt from sulphates is not coloured by the metalloids above mentioned. Dr. Pohson found that the sulphur and the alkaline or earthy sulphurets produce a yellow colour in pure glass and in glass containing sulphates, and that the colour of glass taken under the influence of metalloids is due to one and the same cause, consisting in their reductive faculty.

M. De la Rive, in his investigations on the propagation of electricity in very highly rarefied elastic fluids, has noticed the passage of electricity across the metallic vapours produced by the voltaic arc between the points of the battery. The phenomena observed were the change in the appearance of the jet and the great relative conductibility of the vapours, which is connected with the fact that the vapours which the substances produce in the solid state. When he operated with an alloy, and one element had a high degree of coke, he found that the vapours of the more volatile spark had dissociated the respective metals (zinc, copper, &c.) of which the alloy was composed. At the same meeting he also reported his researches on the optical properties which determine the passage of the electric discharge in various kinds of glass. He found that the passage of a strong electric discharge through insulating transparent bodies caused in them a permanent molecular modification, which he has investigated in a number of different processes. This modification was not limited to the spot where the discharge passed, but extended throughout the whole mass.

At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris MM. Marchal and Tondi de Monty presented specimens of artificial chalk, prepared, accompanied by an account of the various stages of the process. The specimens were examined by Professor Deval (vol. 60, No. 24). He found that the object of the preparation of photographic images. It is of easy application, owing to the fact that the preparation is composed of substances which do not require the time they ought to be submitted to a manner prolonged, and it may be applied artificially to the decoration of all kinds of objects. The substance is principally a fine facility which combines both of alkaline cyanuets and iodocyanuets base of dissolving the silver and silver precipitates. The following is a note from M. C. M. Constantin and Grand, giving his analysis of the sea focus (Sargassum natans), in which he had found 1.726 of phosphoric acid. The author draws that a small quantity of phosphoric exists in sea water, probably derived from the decomposition of fish, molluscs, &c. Marchal and Tondi de Monty presented specimens of artificial chalk, which was also real, recommending burning primes of carbonate of magnesium in a current of oxygen. The result is a carbonate which has no relation to natural chalk, which is not soluble.

In the Proceedings of the Royal Society (No. 75) we have the conclusion of Mr. Gore's paper on the properties of liquefied hydrochloric acid gas. His experiments showed that this substance has a feeble solvent power for solid bodies in general, since out of eighty-six it only dissolved ten. Water, it is well known, has chemical action upon metals other than when mixed with water, as under ordinary circumstances; for instance, the difference of its action upon iron and platinum, when the latter is connected with the negative pole of a galvanic battery. The same number contains an account of the continued experiments of Dr. Brewster on the polarization of passage of crystalline fluids and out of the vascular and non-vascular tissues of the body, which have led to very striking conclusions. Mr. J. Park Harrison has a paper on the results of thirty years' meteorological observations of the influence of the moon on temperature, set forth in a series of propositions. The mean temperature of the moon gives a higher temperature at the moon's first quarter, and a lower temperature after full moon. This number also contains Mr. Lowe's paper on the fibrous texture of the crystalline lens—first described to science, &c. In conclusion, he states that in no tissue has he found a more perfect development of the fibrous texture than in the crystalline lens of the ox. The fibres are of great length, and appear in a compact and uninterrupted circuit; and the general interlacement and probably of anastomosis of the fibres is very remarkable and nerve-fibres. The other papers in this number are principally mathematical.

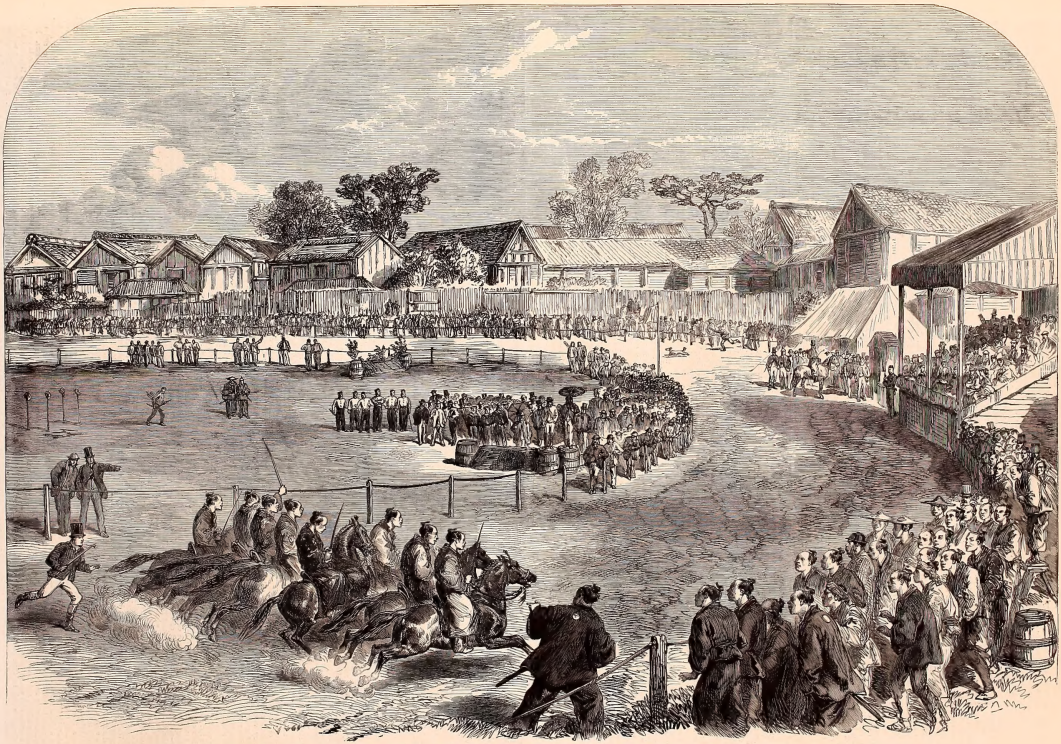
M. Le Verrier has reported to the Academy of Sciences at Paris the observations of Mr. Hind on the "peculiar errors" to which micrometers are liable, due to physiological causes. M. Wolf, having found that the errors of the Paris Observatory, in 1862, were due to the fact that the eye of the observer was fatigued, M. Le Verrier could not impressed from the comparison which he is compelled to make between the observations of Mr. Hind and those of the Paris Observatory. Mr. Hind and the visual impression produced by the passage of the star, he concludes that the error of the eye is due to the impression produced by the passage of the star on the retina, a duration which varies in each observer. M. Le Verrier at the same time observed that the duration of this was observed by Mr. Hind passed Amphitrite alternately with his colleague, M. Marié-Davy, a difference was found to exist, which he considers to be the result of impressibility of the retina of the two observers, especially in regard to colour.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

M. Jules Simon, member of the Corps Législatif of France, delivered the second lecture of his course on "The Working Classes" on Friday last week (on June 29, 30, and 30), to a very distinguished audience, including, among others, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Countess Granville, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Duc de Chartres, the Belgian Minister, and others. The subject was "Woman and Her Work," and mainly referred to the working classes in France. We can only give the prominent points of M. Simon's interesting lecture. The first consideration was the position of woman in the state of the family, and the questions relating to wages, strikes, &c. He contrasted the position of woman in the East with that of woman in the West and women for the charge of her family. Man's weapon is said to be the sword; woman's weapon is the needle—a fact which, he said, explained why women must choose a needle or make a fire—mental things for domestic happiness. Woman, he said, was the natural guardian of the home and the family, and man was the natural protector of the home and the family. Clever needlewomen in Paris earn several francs a day, but these are great exceptions. Many of the best needlewomen work only for the wives and daughters of bankers, and they sell their work. Some women are employed in making artificial flowers, but the occupation is unhealthy. Matchmaking. Workmen in some cities—Mulhausen, for example—are more favourably circumstanced. They have comfortable houses and gardens given to them. The workmen are well housed, and are permitted to work at home, being supplied with the raw material. Many of the workmen inhabited the suburbs of Lille, which created so much sensation a few years ago, are now nearly all closed. The workmen are comfortably off. They have a good deal of work to do, and either of all kinds of work. Their wives and children have now nearly all given up removal to the streets; thus cleanliness and decency cannot exist. Many workmen's wives and children are employed in the factories, and earn the room on which to support their head. Soldiers dwell comfortably in barracks, and they will be comfortable or be unhappy. Workmen have now more liberty to receive the wine, but they will not use them, disliking the restraint and the surveillance of the masters. Some masters build public-houses solely for clerks and employers, not by workmen. At Rouen land was purchased and houses built for workmen, but they would not live in them. Many of the wives go to workmen for the same rent paid for unhealthy rooms in the city; and the wives of the workmen have the conveniences which the masters encourage. Some men paid in advance, and became owners in eight years. Give a man a stake in the country, and he will be a friend to it. Let him have a house and garden, and he will love his family and also his government more heartily. Apprenticeships act disadvantageously, since much time is employed in learning what is not to be done. A good workman earns 5 f. 50 c., and a labourer 3 f. a day; but frequently work is not to be had. In the manufacturing districts the masters and workmen have now more friendly treated, but the reverse. They are very intelligent, and learn political economy rapidly. Strikes are on the decrease on both sides of the question, thinking that the employer has too great profits. It is not small wages, but their misconduct which causes them to be poor. They drink away their wages six days and work the other three. A workman may engage himself to his employer for a year, or for a month, or for a day. Workmen's associations are very common. Some are good, and others are bad. Some are secret societies—a very elastic term—and the Government interferes whenever it pleases. The Government has a right to prevent meetings being held, and to regulate liberty. If the men are treated with consideration mutual benefit may result from workmen's associations. Workmen's parties may sometimes be useful. In the associations for mutual assistance and among the profitsmen, masters and men are associated. The men have a right to the franchise and the liberty by education; where there is no liberty there are soldiers, but no citizens. As co-partners in the schools there are the children of workmen, and new spreading knowledge among the working classes, and as a better feeling between masters and men. Capital is the result of labour, and knowledge and appreciating each other better, let not the hope be considered utopian that the day will come when capital and labour will be united in friendship and humanity, and when the reign of peace and goodwill will be established.

The managers have appointed Thomas H. Huxley, Esq., F.R.S., to be the Fullerian Professor of Physiology.

The waters of the Lake of Constance have been so low this winter as to allow important researches to be made concerning the lacustrine habitations. Many of the piles, axes, celts, stone axes, side axes, bronze axes, fishers, and pisated articles. Everything taken up was deposited in the museum of Constance.



The Ranelagh Yacht Club sailed its first match for the season, on Saturday last, from Ranelagh to the Nore Lightship and back. The following contended:—Clytie, 11 tons, S. Harwood, Esq.; Arielle, 10 tons, Mr. Antill; Ariel, 10 tons, Mr. Antill; Gipsy, 10 tons, Mr. Hellyer; Phantom, 7 tons, Mr. Antill, Esq.; Gipsy, 10 tons, Dr. Fuller; Dione, 12 tons, Mr. Antill; Ariel, 10 tons, Mr. Antill. The prizes were a silver cup, value £15 and £5, the first of these for the first boat in, above 8 tons, and the second for the first boat in, under 8 tons. The Clytie was first home, and the latter by the Arielle.

The Committee of Council on Education have received a letter from the Earl of Derby suggesting the formation of a National Portrait Gallery, similar to that existing in London. Such a gallery, he said, would possess great historical interest, by bringing together portraits of all the most distinguished persons connected with the state, and also of all the illustrious the progress and condition, at various periods, of British art. He also expressed his opinion that the formation of such a gallery would be a work of national importance, and would be hailed by men, and trees, and three, in private families, the owners of which, though they could not be persuaded to part with them, would willingly spare them for a few months for a public object. In conclusion, the noble Earl says, "I shall be very happy if any suggestion of mine should lead the Committee of Council to take up seriously and carry out, with such alterations of detail as experience might suggest, a scheme which I think could hardly fail of being generally interesting; and I should have much pleasure in placing temporarily at their disposal any portraits which I possess, and which they might think worthy of a place in such a gallery." The Committee of Council, by Lord Granville, have requested Mr. Scharf, the keeper of the National Portrait Gallery to be curators of it.

JULY 8, 1865

THE COMING ELECTION.

A code deal has been heard in the last year or two of a great Conservative reaction in the country. Whoever else believes in the existence, there seems to be little doubt that it is accepted and acted upon very largely in the Parliamentary election. In the absence of any special cry, any particular policy, any single measure involving a great principle, there is a sort of general appeal to Conservatism as an ideal, without much definition; and when there is any definition, it is on a gradualist scale. The clear and emphatic, however, is that the narrow range. What is clear and emphatic, however, is that the Conservatives are taking a good fight, and the rush of mild Tory candidature over the country is unprecedented. It is simply every candidature over the country is unprecedented. It is simply every election-eering of Lord this week or so, by a natural impulse one gives precedence to the metropolitan boroughs, and, by all the laws of precedence to the metropolitan boroughs, and, by all the laws of precedence, the city of London stands first amongst them. The struggle is carried on by the Conservative candidates, Mr. Lyall and Mr. Fowler, has summed up their views in a speech, and there is not a little in it, often, and until of late almost always, been the case, one Conservative member will be returned. In fact, as far as the Metropolis is concerned to appear, the Conservative candidates are concentrating their strength against Alderman Cubitt, who contests the City with Mr. Lyall, and Mr. Hubbard, the other party triumph, if it should come about; and here-enthem at their head.

THE SPRING MEETING AT YOKOHAMA: RACE OF JAPANESE OFFICERS—THE START.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PRECEDING PAGE.

THE ELECTION RIOT IN THE GREAT MARKET-PLACE AT NOTTINGHAM.

OUR Illustration gives a view of the disgraceful riot and conflict which took place, in the evening of Monday week, at Nottingham, when an open-air meeting of the electors and non-electors had assembled in the Great Market-place to hear addresses from Messrs. Morley and Paget. The operative framework-knitters of Sutton-in-Ashfield, Kirkby, and other villages, were to come by special train to take part in the proceedings. When the train arrived, the operatives were set upon by a violent rabble and driven back into the station. Numbers of roughs waited, in various avenues in the town, for Messrs. Paget and Morley; but they did not make their appearance. Ultimately, the hustings was got possession of, the flags were torn down, the scaffolding set fire to and totally consumed, the rabble pelted the friends of Mr. Morley with stones, and several persons were seriously injured. The windows of the Express office and other houses were broken. Thousands of persons congregated in the Great Market-place, and the "lambs" armed themselves with bludgeons broken from the hustings. The police for some hours did not make their appearance, and the mob had it entirely their own way. The "lambs" were parading the town, armed with bludgeons. Soldiers, however, had been sent for, from Shrewsbury and Oswestry on arrival, the police now confident of military support, came forth, about ten o'clock at night, to quell the riot. The mob threw a few stones at them, but did not maintain such resistance as to call for the intervention of the soldiery. They were finally cleared out of the Market place, and nearly twenty captives were made; after which the town remained tolerably quiet.

SCENE FROM "ARRAH-NA-POGUE," AT THE PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

The beautiful scene which we have selected for one of our illustrations will be recognised immediately by all who have witnessed, during the last three months, the representation of Mr. Dion Boucicault's very interesting dramatic story at the Princess's Theatre. It is a piece of characteristic Irish scenery, with a romantic, broken arch, a lonely cool-side, a river shining in the moonlight, and the barren hills of the fine background overlooking the forest trysting-place. Mr. Telbin's pictorial skill has, in this instance, provided the most effective accessories to the acting of the representatives of Beamish M'Coul and his sweetheart. The play continues to be performed with an unlikely unabated share of public favour.

The Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief at Newbridge Barracks.

The annual dinner of the 17th Lancers took place at the Curzonian Hotel last Saturday. The Duke of Cambridge, Colonel-in-Chief, presided. The examination extends over fifteen days. As customary, the first day was devoted to the written papers.

The Fusilier regiments are to be relieved of the unsightly busbies, and will have a new head-dress. It will be a shako, of the usual size, the colour black, the size something smaller than a hussar busby, and the shape and outline the identical one worn by the Guards—the service will be a genuine in front, bearing the number of the regiment.

Major-General Lord William Pitt Lennox has been appointed Adjutant-General to the Forces, vice Lieutenant-General the Hon. Sir James Yorke Scarlett, K.C.B., whose term of office as Inspector-General of Cavalry, Lieutenant-General Sir George Bullen Lake succeeded Lord Paulet in the command of the south-west military district, and Major-General Governor of Portsmouth Garrison.

Field Marshal Sir Charles Yorke Trench, at Devenport, has informed the Mayor of Plymouth that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have given warm interest to the proposal for the enlargement of the Hoe, that two or three French ships of war will be at anchor in the Sound on the 14th inst. On leaving the harbour they will be joined by some of the other principal ports in England, while the British ships of war will go round the coast of France.

Lieutenant-Colonel G. S. Young, unattached, has been appointed assistant military secretary to the Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Island of Ceylon; Captain W. F. B. Seymour, of the new permanent Garrison, is to be Staff Officer to Major-General Lord Frederick Paulet, C.B., commanding the Canada division, in the room of Captain V. Ivor, Grenadier Guards, who has been placed on the retired list; and Captain L. S. Cotton, 43rd Regiment, is appointed Aide-de-Camp to Major-General Sir Sydney Cotton, K.C.B., commanding at Aldershot.

The Malabar, hired transport, has arrived from Calcutta, whence she sailed on the 8th of February, with the head-quarters and left wing of the 1st Battalion Royal Scots, 1,000 troops and men and invalids, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Sargent, and medical charge of Surgeon-Major Murphy; also Lieutenant Evans, 19th Regiment, and Lieutenant Agnew, 25th Regiment; eight soldiers' wives, and twelve children. Seven deaths occurred on the voyage. The time-expired men have been forwarded to the depôt at Fort George, and invalids to the invalids removed to the Royal Victoria Hospital, Netley.

The Queen has appointed Major-General John Aitchison, Lieutenant-General Sir Robert Napier, Major-General Sir Sydney John Cotton, Major-General Henry Eyre, Major-General Sir Frederick Haines, Major-General David Russell, and Major-General Sir William Mansfield, to be Her Majesty's Commissioners to inquire into the Indian expenditure, consequent on the report of the Commissioners appointed by her Majesty in March, 1884, to investigate the organisation of the Indian Army, and that the late Indian Army, are effectual and sufficient for the purpose of removing such causes of complaint, as were reported by the said Commissioners of inquiry by a departure from the measures given by Parliament.

The Prince of Wales presided at the distribution of the delivery of prizes and the recitations by the cadets at Wellington College. His Royal Highness, supported by the Earl of Derby, Lord Lieutenant of the County of Oxford, and other distinguished persons, took his seat upon a raised dais at the further end of the room, the cadets occupying the body of the room. The Prince presented the Queen's medal and the chief of the other prizes, the Earl of Derby awarding the fourth. In the course of his remarks the Earl of Derby had set apart the profits arising from his "Homer" to form a scholarship, to be held by the highest classical scholar in the Upper Sixth for the year of his residence; and his Lordship, in the name of the Duke of Westminster, who was unable to be present, offered a like sum to found a scholarship, to be held by the boy who should be adjudged the best all-round boy of the year, to accommodate about fifty boys, are in course of erection.

The Malabar, hired transport, has arrived from Hong Kong, which she left, on the 23rd of February, with military invalids, time-expired men, and private passengers, 1,000 troops and men of the 17th Regiment Royal Artillery, under the command of Lieutenant-Kane and Lieutenant Lloyd, 17th Regiment; and Lieutenant Kane and Lieutenant Lloyd, 17th Royal Artillery, under the command of Lieutenant-Kane and Lieutenant Lloyd, 17th Regiment; and a few soldiers' wives and children, from the ports in the China station. The latter were removed to the Sapphir Victory and Hazlar Hospital. The military invalids, under the medical charge of Staff Surgeon Longland, were sent to the Royal Victoria Hospital, Netley, and the time-expired men landed at the dockyard stairs, and marched to the depôt at their respective regiments. The battery of artillery landed at the Royal Garrison yard is to be stationed on one of the forts at Gosport. Seven men died on the voyage.

The new recreation-room at the Royal Marine Barrack, Chatham, was opened last Saturday. The old theatre has been converted into a recreation-room and institute. There is a library of more than 2000 volumes, a reading-room, a refreshment-bar, and a recreation-room; the latter contains three bagatelle tables, two draught boards, a chessboard, a draughts, and other games. A commencement has been made at Gosport in providing a similar recreation-room, and the Admiralty made by the Home Guards for providing, where practicable, plots of ground to be cultivated by soldiers for their own advantage. A number of the military have been engaged in clearing, digg ng, and planting a portion of the ground between the upper and lower drawbridges. The annual athletic sports of the Chatham marines and soldiers will be held on Saturday next. There were still entered for the latter, officers, and civilians. The programme was of a varied character, and the prizes numerous. Everything passed off well.

The household troops were reviewed on Thursday week by the Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge and the Duke of Rednaut. The troops ordered for the review were the Grenadier, the Coldstream, and the Scots Fusilier Guards, of each of which regiments there was a good ground; the 3rd Life Guards, the Royal Horse Guards, and reversal batteries of Royal Artillery, were brigaded under the command of Major-General Owen in the centre, with artillery, Life Guards, and artillery on the right of centre; Grenadier Guards, Coldstream Horse Guards, and artillery on the left. Their Royal Highnesses were received on the ground where the troops were brigaded by the 11th Hussars, assisted by a large body of the metropolitan police. The troops were drawn up in line, with the artillery in the centre of the respective wings. At the conclusion of the movements the Duke of Cambridge, in the presence of the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Rednaut, thanked the several officers commanding before him, and congratulated them on the efficiency of the different corps engaged, and personal his satisfaction with which the whole force had behaved on the field.

The following Admiralty order has been posted at the Government dockyards, signed by the superintendents of these establishments: "Voting at Elections.—Workmen employed in the dockyards are prohibited directly or indirectly, shall be exercised over any person, whatever be his rank or station, by any of the officers of the establishment, with a view to the election for members of Parliament, for town or county, the men who may be qualified to vote. The exercise of these restrictions will be considered sufficient reason for dismissal."

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

A field-day of several London volunteer regiments took place, last Saturday, on Wimbledon Common, under the command of Lieutenant-General Sir C. Wade, C.B., commandant of the garrison, with regular troops and a large force of artillery, in honour of the Commander-in-Chief's birthday. The regular troops engaged were the 8 battery B brigade Royal Horse Artillery, the 11th Hussars, and the 1st battalion Scots Fusilier Guards, under the command of the 4th Royal Artillery, two batteries mounted division, Shoeburyness Royal Artillery, and two batteries of the 11th Kent Royal Artillery, with Royal Engineers, under the command of the 11th Kent Royal Artillery. The London regiments were the City of London Rifle Brigade, under Lieutenant-Colonel Wyke, the 1st Middlesex Engineers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Ranelagh having command of a brigade; the 19th Middlesex (St. George's Rifles), under Lieutenant-Colonel Hutchinson, Queen's Westminster, Lieutenant-Colonel Lindsay, assisted by Captain and Adjutant Rothun; the Queen's (Westminster) Volunteers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Lewis Pelly, Fitzgerald, Lieutenant-Colonels of the first and second battalions; the Inns of Court, under Lieutenant-Colonel Cunningham, and the 1st Surrey and the 4th Tower Hamlets: in the aggregate, about 6000 men of all ranks, having been formed into two divisions, the command of the first division, the more easterns of battalions, and the infantry by general order, the 1st Middlesex Engineers, the City of London Rifle Brigade, and the excellent style, the volunteers were formed into two divisions, the attacking and defending. The first division of cavalry and artillery, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Lewis Pelly, Fearse, R.A., as Brigade-Major, and was composed of two batteries of the 8th Royal Horse Artillery, the 11th Hussars, and artillery. The object of the brigade of infantry of this division consisted of four battalions of volunteers, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Lewis Leverton, R.A., Brigade-Major. The second division was composed of two batteries, second division Royal Artillery, the Scots Fusilier Guards, under Lieutenant-Colonel D. A. Baker, with Captain Gilmer, R.A., as Brigade Major; and a brigade of infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Lewis Pelly, Fitzgerald, assisted by Lieutenant-Colonel Stuart as Brigade-Major, consisting of a battalion of the Queen's Westminster, the Inns of Court, and the Tower Hamlets volunteers. The object of the attacking force was to capture the enemy's position in front, with their rear resting on the fence in front of the Ha-Ha, in its entirety or as much as possible, and to prevent the enemy from the defending force marched straight up the hill to the top of the common, and, leaving four battalions of infantry and artillery, extended and commenced to form in front, with their rear resting on the Hut station, and the artillery on either flank, the attacking force advanced in line of battalions in front, and, after performing other manœuvres, the front line advanced under cover of volunteers to the edge of the hill, and opened fire, and then made a good retired retrieval, it became occupied by the first line. To check the advancing force the defending force advanced a battalion in front, and the rear battalion from its left, each battalion extending to the front, and

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH.

The Right Hon. Sir William Basil Percy Feilding, P.C., G.C.B., D.C.L., seventh Earl of Denbigh, and Baron Feilding, of Newnham Paddox, Warwickshire, and Lord Kenlis, in the Peerage of Ireland, Earl of Desmond, Viscount Callan, and Baron Feilding, in the Peerage of Ireland, Count of Hapsburg, Rheinfelden, and Laufenburg, in the Austrian Empire, who died, on the 25th ult., at Newnham Paddox, Rugby, aged 76, was the eldest son of Major-General William Robert Basil, Viscount Feilding, by his wife, Anne eldest daughter of Thomas Joll Powle, Esq., of Berwick House, Salop, and Montrose Hall, Cheshire, and was grandson of Basil, sixth Earl of Denbigh. He was born on March 29, 1798, and was educated at Rugby, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1819; and was made a D.C.L. of Oxford in 1845. He succeeded his grandfather, as seventh Earl of Denbigh, on July 14, 1800. He was formerly Colonel of Militia; years connected with the Court of King William IV., and was the confidential friend of that Monarch and his unfortunate consort, Queen Adelaide, during the latter part of their married life. He was appointed Groom of the Bedchamber, Master of the Horse to Queen Adelaide until the time of her Privy Councillor in 1839 held by her in the highest estimation. He married, May 7, 1832, Lady Mary Elizabeth Hastings, eldest daughter of the late Earl of Huntingdon, and first Earl of Doncie, by whom (who died Dec. 16, 1862) he had five sons, four of whom survive, and six daughters, five of whom survive him, and one of them, Lady Jane Lisney Hamilton, is the wife of Captain Theophilus John Lewis Hamilton, of Shirley, Hampshire. The Earl is succeeded by his eldest son, Rudolph William Basil, Viscount Feilding, now Eighth Earl of Denbigh, who was born April 3, 1832, and married, first (June 18, 1860), Louisa, only daughter and heiress of the late David Pennant, Esq., and (in 1864) Lady Emma Pleasance, youngest daughter of Flintshire, Lady Feilding died, at Naples, May 1, 1863, without issue; and his Lordship married, secondly (Sept. 1, 1864), Lady Augusta Mary Clarke, youngest daughter of Robert Berkeley, Esq., of Spetchley Park, Worcestershire, by whom he has a son, Percy Augustus Basil, born in August, 1865, and two daughters, Clara Mary Feilding and Hilda Mary Feilding. The new Earl has many settlements in England as far back as Earls of Desmond, Kings of Leinster, and Princes of Ireland, for in above the time of King Henry III. he origin is traced. He is also descended from the princely house of Hapsburg, which gave Emperors and Empresses to most of the great Christian Houses of Europe. The Feildings have also been in their pedigree the name of Henry Feilding, the novelist, an honour which Gibbon, the historian, lamongst gentlemen has recently claimed descent. The first Earl was Sir William Feilding, of Newnham Paddox, Warwickshire, a staunch Cavalier, who was created to the earldom of Denbigh, Sept. 14, 1622, and who fell, fighting for King Charles, at a skirmish near Birmingham, April 2, 1643. One of his sons was the first Viscount Feilding, Desmond to the other family honours. From the first Earl of Denbigh, their seat always at Newnham Paddox, down to the present day, has been the family home. The Hall of Newnham Paddox, so "picturesque" was (by his first wife, Sarah, daughter of Sir Henry Lee, of Ditchley, Lodge of the Garter, and Knight of the Royal Oak) the maternal Edmund Fielding, great-grandson of the first Earl of Denbigh, Commissary-General, the father of Henry Fielding, Rector of Sedgeberry, Lincolnshire, is his present representative.

LADY JOHN SOMERSET.

This lady, who died, in Paris, on the 28th ult., was Lady Catherine Annesley, daughter of the first Earl Annesley, Viscount Valentia, and first Earl of Mountnorris, by his second wife, Lady Catherine Hobart, eldest daughter of the fourth Earl of Buckinghamshire, and sister to the wife Baroness Westerholt. Lady Catherine Hon. Henry Fane, and was married, first, to Lord Arthur Hill, second son of the late Marquis of Downshire, seventh son of Sir Henry Somerset, K.G., fifth Duke of Beaufort. Lord Arthur died Oct. 6, 1810. By that nobleman Lady Catherine had (with three daughters, who all died before her—viz., Frances, Mrs. Beauregard, of Castle Hill, Cullompton, Devon; Lady Julia Hill, married Mrs. Lyon, of Miserden Park, Gloucestershire on only son, the present Alfred Fitzgerald Frederick Charles Somerset Lyon, Esq., of Enfield Court, Middlesex.

SIR WILLIAM LAWSON, BART.

Sir William Lawson, Bart., of Brough Hall, in the county of York, who died at that seat, on the 23rd ult., was born in 1794, and was the second son of John Wright, Esq., of Kelvedon Hall, Essex, by his wife Anne, eldest daughter and sole heiress of Sir John Lawson, Bart., and was nephew of Sir Henry Lawson, Bart., the late Member for Carlisle, and father of Sir John Lawson, Bart., the present member. He was born at Kelvedon, and was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1815, and M.A. in 1818, and was made a D.C.L. of Oxford in 1845. He succeeded his grandfather, as second Baronet of Brough, on July 14, 1800. He was formerly Lieutenant-Colonel of the North Cumberland Militia, and was the confidential friend of that Monarch and his unfortunate consort, the late Queen Adelaide. He was Master of the Horse to Queen Adelaide until the time of her Privy Councillor in 1839 held by her in the highest estimation. He married, May 7, 1832, Lady Mary Elizabeth Hastings, eldest daughter of the late Earl of Huntingdon, and first Earl of Doncie, by whom (who died Dec. 16, 1862) he had five sons, four of whom survive him, and six daughters, five of whom survive him, and one of them, Lady Jane Lisney Hamilton, is the wife of Captain Theophilus John Lewis Hamilton, of Shirley, Hampshire. other, Henry, was drowned in a storm off the coast of Cornwall, while trying to save the life of a shepherd. Sir William is succeeded by his eldest son, Edward Lawson, who was born on the 17th of December, 1829, and married, on the 4th of October, 1857, Mary Isabella, eldest daughter of the late Edward Marriott, Esq., of Aquil House, Lincolnshire, and has three daughters. His next brother, the Rev. William Lawson, a clergyman of the Church of England, is at present heir presumptive to the baronetcy. This Catholic and Cavalier family of Lawson is of old and honourable standing in the county palatine of Yorkshire. The first Baronet of the earlier creation, Sir John Lawson, a Captain of Horse in the service of Charles I., was created a Baronet by King Charles II. in 1665, in consideration of all he had suffered and lost during the Civil War.

DR. FERGUSON.

Robert Ferguson, Esq., M.D., L.R.C.P., Physician Extraordinary to the Queen, and a gentleman of high eminence in the medical profession, who died, after a few hours' illness, on the 29th ultimo, at his residence, Gower Street, Bedford College, Winkfield, near Windsor, was the son of Robert Ferguson, Esq., of the Indian Civil Service, and descended from the Fergusons of Vinn Abbey, in Perthshire, and was grand-nephew of Adam Ferguson, author of the well-known work on the Roman Republic, and grandson of Adam Ferguson, M.D., who died in November, 1799, and received his early education at Croydon, and had his school-days cheered by the memory of "Tu Gymnasium." Ferguson was at school under Dr. Long; but, after passing some time in the Civil Service, Ferguson became he obtained a deep knowledge of German literature and habits of thought, he determined to devote himself to the study of the medical profession. He went to Edinburgh and studied physic, and became M.D. in 1838. His long subsequent years of professional practice were marked by no medical attendant, with various families in high life. He, however, soon made his way to practice and fame, she physician extraordinary to the medical celebrities of his day. He was Physician Extraordinary to the Queen and Prince Consort, and was highly esteemed throughout her confidences. Queen and Prince Consort, and was highly esteemed throughout her confidences. He had been physician-general to the Royal Household, and was consulting physician to the London Hospital, and also professor of midwifery at King's College. Among his published works, all of deep research, his book "On Pregnant Fevers" stands pre-eminent. Dr. Ferguson was not only a physician, but a man of general knowledge, and was highly esteemed among the great men of his time. He enjoyed among these the intimacy of Sir Walter Scott, and especially that of Lockhart, the biographer. Throughout where life he maintained the most constant and affectionate intercourse with Washington Irving, the American author, and Allston the painter, were also amongst his intimates. Amongst his professional friends very recently was Dr. Elliotson, President of the College of Physicians, Sir Benjamin Brodie, and especially Dr. Gooch.

CAPTAIN GOLIVIE, R.A.

Alexander W. A. Golivie, Esq., a Captain in the Royal Artillery, and for some years instructor of gunnery at Shoeburyness, whose premature decease, in his thirty-first year, has been much deplored by a circle of friends, brother officers, and his other numerous friends, was the only child of Dr. Alexander Golivie, of Bloomsbury Square, by his wife Christina, eldest daughter of Mr. Alexander Barclay of Dowall, as representative of Sir Walter Ogilvie, of Boyne, who died in 1504. Captain Golivie, the subject of this notice, married, June 8, 1860, Gertrude Jessica Adeline, elder daughter of Vice-Admiral Deaton, R.N., and cousin of Sir John Lewis Deaton, Bart., by whom he leaves an only child, Alexander. Captain Golivie died, at Shoeburyness, on the 31st ult.

A correspondent calls attention to the fact that Lieut.-Colonel Lord Charles Fitzroy was educated at Harrow, and not at Eton; and to a typical error in our recent notice, which mentions him as having been Vice-Chancellor, instead of Vice-Chamberlain, of the Royal Household.

No. 1324.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

RECONSTRUCTION, BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

A GREAT work of political reconstruction is in mid progress in the United Kingdom. We are not, indeed, refashioning our Constitution. The three estates of the realm, their proper sphere and limits of action, their mutual duties and responsibilities, remain what they have been, and are unchallenged by public opinion. We are meddling with none of our great national institutions. We are shifting nothing of importance from its ancient basis. Nevertheless, we have been engaged throughout the week now closing, and we shall be more or less generally engaged for the next fortnight, in building up again that part of the machinery of government which, because it bears the chief stress of legislation and has a predominant influence on its character and results, is wisely submitted to periodical renovation with a view to adapt it to such change as may have passed upon the public mind. The Crown, acting in conformity with law, has dissolved one House of Commons, and the country is busy in putting together another. Strictly speaking, the work is one of reconstruction, but reconstruction in an extremely limited sense.

In the very thick of the turmoil inevitably occasioned by a general election there is ground for satisfaction in the knowledge that the process is attended with no danger. The legislative mechanism which on Monday morning last was non-existent, and which even yet is but half refitted, will be framed on the same model, with two or three trifling exceptions, as that which has served the use of the present generation. Such alterations as are now being made will affect merely the materials of which it is composed. The leading wheels and principal levers in the machine will, for the most part, be replaced from the old one. They will, no doubt, be cleansed of some of the deposit which during six years' work has accumulated about them, and which had helped somewhat to clog their movements. Friction against the great outside public will, perhaps, rub away some soil and rust, and fit them for accelerated action. But no great change is desired or will be effected as regards them. In conjunction, however, with these more important parts, there are a considerable number and variety of minor pieces, all having something to do towards the general result, and each susceptible, in doing it, of improvement or decay. It is here that the chief alterations are to be expected. Old and untrustworthy appliances, or, what in effect amounts to the same thing, those which are thought to be such, will be cast aside for new and more promising material. That which is suffered to remain will in many cases be passed through the fire, hammered into more convenient forms, polished and lubricated, and refitted to its former place. There will be a deal of scouring and cleaning, the substitution of not a little that is untried for that which after trial is found wanting, and, it is to be hoped, a general improvement of the machinery in regard to the parts of which it is composed; but that will be the whole amount of positive change accomplished or sought. There is nothing in all this calculated to unsettle public confidence, nothing to excite misgivings as to the future, no empiricism of which the most timid need to be afraid.

Of course, we do not mean to imply that change even to this extent may not or will not involve some change in the action of Parliament. We shall not assume to judge what may be the character of the future House of Commons, or what will be the drift of its policy. Only events will bring either the one or the other fully into light. But we do regard it as matter of satisfaction that, on the whole, the process which is being now resorted to will tend rather to abridge than to widen the distance between the legislatorial power and the settled convictions and will of the country. Whatever these latter may prove to be, after the criticism, the siftings, and the verdict of a general election, they may be embodied in law without imperilling anything which commends itself to sound sense and just feeling, and almost as certainly without producing so much as a jar upon the nervous system of the community. We may anticipate just so much expansion in the aims and proceedings of the Government as will be rendered necessary by any expansion which has taken place in the thoughts and wishes of the public. That is all; and that is a process which every intelligent and well-trained mind will be content to submit. So that, as far as the United Kingdom is concerned, reconstruction is but a renovation of means and apparatus, with growth as the result. The process is far more unimportant. Upon those who conduct it rests a grave responsibility, but, at least, it is unaccompanied by serious apprehensions for the future.

Our kinsmen on the other side of the Atlantic are also intent just now upon the business of reconstruction—but under what different circumstances and on how much wider a scale! Let it not be supposed that we allude to the contrast for the sake of self-glorification—we do so merely, with a view to deepen our own sense of thankfulness. That they have to face and master, as we can hardly doubt they will do, a much more searching and difficult problem than ourselves, cannot be attributed to the superiority of our qualifications, or of our mode of using them, in any respect. Our good fortune is, that we long since passed through that stage of national discipline which they have but just reached, and that the end they will put through it without more permanent suffering than we. Still, as a simple matter of fact, the processes which are at this moment operative in the two countries differ so widely the one from the other in depth, intensity, and duration, that one cannot help viewing them side by side. The reconstructive work now absorbing the energies of American statesmanship is not only difficult, but it touches upon several dangerous issues. Whereas, in our own case, the past, and especially the proximate past, is our mainstay, it is in theirs the source of disquietude. They have to reconstitute the South, not merely of new materials, but after a new model. They have to reorganise the very foundations of society. The civil war has broken up the pre-existing social system, and has pretty well levelled to the dust the political edifice. It would seem impracticable to reconstruct the latter in conformity with the previous notions of law, and, happily, as we think, impossible, as well as impolitic, to base society on the maintenance or rather the restoration of slavery. The consequence is an immense amount of present confusion. Slavery—and slavery—the inevitable debris of an armed conflict on so gigantic a scale. Some time will be required before the dust and smoke have sufficiently cleared away to allow of the new organisation being adopted and brought into operation. Much suffering will doubtless, be endured meanwhile; but our Transatlantic cousins are not deficient in a talent for organisation. We believe they will work out the question in the end with much success; and, at the most critical moment, that has been generally expected, and that the social difficulty will, after its first pressure, yield to the appliances which robust common-sense will bring to bear upon it.

The contrast between the two countries at the present moment suggests matter for profitable consideration. A theory has been advanced by some, that no great nation can fully develop its capabilities until it has undergone the ordeal of a civil war, and that, in the course of its history, one such convulsive intestine struggle is inevitable. We shall not discuss this theory, neither can we assent to it. It may be true of certain stages of civilisation, but the question whether it can be predicated as a law applicable to nations which are, or will hereafter be, the growth of offshoots from a population already educated and trained in the principles and practice of self-government, is, to say the least, open to doubt. The experience presented to us by history of the attainment of political and social results by violent means makes us doubt whether the process be not more costly than the end will repay, and whether the quickest way be not so great that the time, the anxiety, the exertion, and the self-sacrifice required for the work of reparation might not have sufficed, if employed in conformity with law, to accomplish, with a given period, all that may have been achieved by the sword, and without anything like the attendant suffering. The upward and onward destinies of a people are seldom, if ever, permanently hastened by force. They are the result of moral culture, and in very few and exceptional instances is moral culture quickened by the destruction of property or the effusion of blood. The reconstruction rendered necessary by mortal conflicts is always difficult, often dangerous, and sometimes slower in arriving at its consummation—namely, the settlement of the vital question in dispute—than the patient use of milder methods would have been. We may well be thankful that the business on which our fellow-countrymen are now engaged is one which less than a month will be required to effect, and which, when effected, will place the country a step in advance; and we may sincerely sympathise with our American cousins that their work does not promise so speedy results in the ease and certainty with which it may be dispatched. To bind up and heal deep wounds is a serious affair—to wash and be refreshed is but a trifling demand on exertion. Such, however, is the difference between what they and we are engaged in doing at the present time.

The Admiralty have decided that the responsibility of navigating a ship shall rest with the Captain, but that he shall be assisted by a navigating Lieutenant. Matters are to be simplified.

By a provision in a new Act, the Judges of the county courts are relieved for the first time from sitting during the month of September. They can now enjoy their long vacation like other Judges.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Emperor presided at a Council of State on Wednesday. The Senate was prorogued yesterday week. Marshal M'Mahon, Governor of Algeria, is in Paris.

Abd-el-Kader arrived in Paris on Saturday last by the express-train from Lyons. The Emir, magnificently dressed, wore the broad ribbon of the Legion of Honour. He was received by the crowd with expressions of respect and sympathy. He is the lion of the day, and takes his daily drive in the Bois de Boulogne and the Champs Elysées. According to one correspondent, "he has grown much older in appearance since last he visited Paris." He is "quite a broken man;" and his beard, which was then as black as coal, has become snow white. His frame, however, seems as lithe and active as ever.

The Minister of State has been intrusted with the direction of the Ministry of Public Works during the absence of M. Rouher.

M. Thiers is about to publish his speeches, delivered during the last Session, on the Roman question, and on political liberty and the finances.

The treaty of commerce and navigation between France and Holland was finally concluded yesterday week.

The Imperial Court of Paris has heard an appeal against a judgment of the Civil Tribunal of Fontainebleau, in an action brought by M. Pouchet, of Lyons, against Mdlle. Rosa Bonheur, for breach of contract. On the 4th March, 1865, the contract was signed, by M. Pouchet a painting to be executed expressly for him at the price of 10,000f. As the work was not sent at the specified time, M. Pouchet wrote to complain of the delay, and a long correspondence ensued, which ended in the absolute refusal of Mdlle. Bonheur to fulfil her engagement. Hereupon M. Pouchet commenced legal proceedings and demanded 15,000f. damages for breach of contract; but the tribunal rejected this claim, and pronounced judgment that the artist should within six months under a penalty of 20f. for every day's delay beyond that time, deliver the picture. This judgment M. Pouchet appealed against and repeated her refusal to deliver the painting. After hearing counsel for both parties the Court of Appeal confirmed the decision of the Court on its merits, condemned the appellant to pay M. Pouchet 4000f. damages, and cost of appeal.

The match between the Paris Cricket Club and eleven officers of the 60th Rifles, second battalion, commenced on Thursday week, in the victory of the former, with eight wickets to spare.

An accident took place on Thursday week on the line of railway between Lyons and Marseilles. Two persons were killed and twenty injured.

The Patrie announces that the grand rendezvous and review of the French and English fleets will take place, not at Brest, as originally intended, but at Cherbourg, during the time appointed for the arrival of the English fleet at the latter place is Aug. 14.

SPAIN.

Queen Isabella's formal recognition of Victor Emmanuel as King of Italy has been intimated by the Cabinet to the Papal Government.

On Wednesday week there was a Grand Council of State held in the Congress closing the Cortes.

The Senate has passed the bill modifying the Press Law by 117 against 16 votes, and has adopted the bill ratifying the customs tariff concluded between France and Spain.

PORTUGAL.

The Government, contrary to general expectation, has carried the elections by a large majority throughout Portugal. In Lisbon and Oporto, however, the Opposition obtained the majority.

HOLLAND.

In the Second Chamber of the States General, on Wednesday, the Ministry withdrew the bill abolishing the stamp duty, after a stormy debate.

AUSTRIA

In the sitting of the Upper House of the Reichsrath, on Thursday week, the Minister of Finance explained that, in consideration of the financial position of the country, and taking into account political circumstances, the Government had concluded a treaty of peace with Italy and Dalmatia to a complete peace footing. He added that the Emperor proposed to summon the Hungarian Diet, and would be observed in all branches of the administration. The House unanimously passed a resolution to the effect that the orders in council relative to the Budget for 1865, as voted by the Lower House.

In the sitting of the Upper House, yesterday week, Count Thun, in a speech which has given universal offence, spoke against modern Constitutionalism, and combated the idea that Absolutism would cause financial difficulties. The Count declared that the Upper House should pass a resolution declaring an increase of the taxes impossible without the consent of the Provinces, unless circumstances should arise in revenue and expenditure be thereby established. Count Thun expressed a desire that the Government should introduce a system in the different branches of the public administration, and concluded by proposing that the Upper House should express its appreciation that the Government would not again require it to approve such a Budget as that presented for 1865. Count Thun's motion was referred to a committee.

RUSSIA.

An Imperial ukase has been issued at St. Petersburg decreeing that, in order to facilitate the traffic across the European frontiers of Russia, all passports, except on users of articles of contraband will be partly abolished and partly reduced. The duties on goods from Transcaucasian provinces, the Caucasus, and the Crimea, remain as duty and quarantine dues on the frontier of Asia is abolished.

The Exhibition of Manufactures, in Moscow, was opened on Sunday next the morning. A dinner has been given by the exhibitors to the Governor-General, at which free-trade speeches were made by the Mitchell, Alcock, Hall, and Wilson families. Mr. Shipton is also the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce.

An Imperial ukase has been issued and published at Warsaw ordering a military conscription throughout Poland, to take place in November next. For the last conscription there was every reason to call by called out, and for the reserve three men in every two thousand.

AMERICA.

Telegrams from New York, to the 1st inst., state that the conspiracy trial in Washington has been concluded. The Military Commission has pronounced its verdict, but it will not be made public until after it has been either approved or rejected by the President. The Richmond Enquirer publishes a letter from Jefferson, asserting that four of the prisoners were fellow-conspirators with Booth. They comprised John Surratt, Confederate agent in Canada, Sanders, Tucker, and others, planned and assisted the assassination.

Owing to too close application to his duties, President Johnson has been indisposed for several days, and was unable to take part in Cabinet meetings.

Colonel Mosby, the celebrated Confederate cavalry raider, has been pardoned by the President, and has commenced practising law at Culpepper Court-House.

A deputation from South Carolina has had an interview with President Johnson on the question of reconstruction. The President's reply has been published to State would go out of the Union. He must deal with certain questions, reconstruction. The people of South Carolina could not be admitted to Congressional representation until they called a convention and assented to the abolition of slavery, repudiated the debt, and abolishing slavery. He thought if negro suffrage were now granted negroes would be forced into power, and the Government of the poor whites. He would, after consultation with his Cabinet, consider the appointment of a governor.

President Johnson has ordered the military authorities at Charleston not to prohibit political assemblages of coloured people.

General Terry has issued an order at Richmond that the negroes will enjoy the same personal liberty and be subject to the same restraints as whites.

The Virginia Legislature has adjourned, after extending the franchise to those excluded by the Alexandria Constitution.

There have been serious affrays between the Federal soldiers and the blacks at several places. At Norfolk the troops, aided by the white inhabitants, had driven the negroes from the town. At Charleston there had been a fight between the white and black soldiers, and several were wounded on each side. At Savannah a New York regiment had mutinied, and refused to do duty with the black troops; and forty-three of the mutineers had been apprehended, and imprisoned in Fort Pulaski. A serious affray took place at Portsmouth, Virginia, between the white and coloured people. Many persons were wounded.

General Herron, commanding in Northern Louisiana, has forbidden the slaves to leave the plantations.

The Governor of Kentucky has addressed the people, declaring slavery to be dead and urging the adoption of the constitutional amendment.

General Hooker has superseded General Dix.

THE ELECTION.

Out of the din and confusion of the electoral struggle the new Parliament is being rapidly evolved. A descriptive catalogue of its multifarious and almost consentaneous occurrences presents difficulties somewhat akin to those which we have undertaken of to paint a battle fought over many square miles of ground on a canvas of a few square feet. Consequently, we shall, as usual, confine ourselves to the salient points and the remarkable incidents of the elections generally.

For good reasons, precedence should be given to the metropolitan boroughs, even if they had not been in the field in regards time, for and this occasion the elections for those constituencies have gained unusual marks of distinctiveness. Primarily, it may be noticed that the Tower Hamlets has had the honour of returning the first members to the new Parliament, the two representatives having been elected without a contest, and Mr. Ayrton has thus perhaps acquired an additional right to consider—as he seems to consider—himself entitled to the old masking. The interest which attached to Westminster was justifiable, as well as natural, in the vigorous effort of an essentially popular local candidate to introduce the Conservative element into the representation of a metropolitan borough as to ensure the success of the candidature of a high philosophical Radical in the person of Mr. Stuart Mill. His claims to be a philosopher were never better vindicated than by the manner in which the issue was contested (and which, by-the-by, was characteristic in an eminent degree of all the metropolitan elections), for it was the clearness to be witnessed in the speech which he doubtless intended to deliver, and substituted for it a few words of thanks and brief commentary on the speech which he tossed towards that specimen of the people which was before him, as well as towards the electors at large, that brought to bear the whole condition, social and political, he has bestowed so much thought. It was a marvellous, but a logical, prestige. Mr. Mill, after all, has only to return to a coalition with the representative of the Grosvenor territorial interest in the borough, who stood at the head of his poll, to form an interesting event in the conflict for Lambeth, where a man of letters and a social reformer stood against local influence and the aldermanic interest. Of course Mr. Hogg and Mr. Rogers were duly contributed, along with that of Mr. Goschen, at the head of the poll, in the City; Mr. Layard, in Marylebone; Mr. Holmesdale's old friend, Mr. Locke, in Finsbury, where poor Mr. Cox was, emphatically, nowhere; and, in the Tower Hamlets, Mr. Hanbury, Sir Morton Peto, Mr. Ayrton, and Sir Charles Bright, for Greenwich, to redeem metropolitan ownership in a tradition of which the Liberal party has enjoyed having every now and some of them more than ordinary mark, as representative. It is also a matter of the highest interest that the Conservative representation in Liberal. The changes in this district have been rather numerous—Lord Fermoy, Mr. Alderman Lawrence, Sir James Duke, Mr. Alderman Wilson Patten, Sir John Shelley, Mr. Cox, and Sir Morton Peto having given way to Mr. Chambers, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Alderman Cubitt, Captain Grosvenor, Mr. Torrens, and Mr. Alderman Lusk respectively.

In examining the results of the elections, and finding, by-the-way, that their tendency is towards an increase in the number of Liberal members as compared with the last Parliament, it is needful that an early consideration would be how the Ministers, in their own proper persons, have fared at the hands of the public. Not that anything is, in all due precedence, let it be stated that an illustration of Lord Palmerston, when speaking somewhat facetiously and in a half-jocular vigore from his contact with his old constituency, and Mr. Gladstone's address at Greenwich, while, as Lord of the Treasury, in the old fashion in which he has so often delighted them: thus, if he failed it, would be the result of a personal feeling. The fate of the Ministry whose fortunes have been decided in the elections, Sir G. C. Lewis, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Clarendon, Lord Privy Seal for Oxford; Mr. R. A. Bruce and Mr. M. Gibson for Rochdale; Mr. Hutt for Gateshead; and Mr. Milner Gibson for Ipswich; Mr. Villiers, President of the Board of Trade, has been returned for Wolverhampton from a rather discreditable attempt at opposition; Sir Charles Wood for Halifax; Mr. Cardwell for Liverpool; Mr. Stansfeld for Halifax; Mr. Goschen at Plymouth. The tide of Ministerial success has, however, been checked in what may be called its under-current, and the Government has not come out as well as all other Governments as it is to make a House, to keep a House, and to cheer the Ministers—a House which, as Lord Derby, in the days of his predecessor, Lord Aberdeen, to the Treasury, has lost Bury—mainly, it is said, through the secondary to the Derby Government. Colonel White, a Lord of the Treasury, has been beaten at Kidderminster; Lord Alfred Paget, a member of her Majesty's household, at Lichfield; and Colonel Wilbraham has composed since 1857, and Lord Fury, Treasurer of the Household, has failed in the contest for the county at Lewes. But what has Mr. Bruce, the patronage Secretary to the Treasury, the great mystery man of the Government, the holder of the electioneering storage all over the country, done with his patronage? Lewes has failed to be hooted, jeered, cheered, a forest of hands held up against him, and he, of all men, obliged to retire from the field. Mr. Bruce has had that distribution which it requires all his skill and discretion to regulate, and has been in relation to the claimants, electors, and constituencies, what he ought to have been. While speaking of this special office, it is well to add that the post of "Whipper-in" and manager of Government patronage on record, has passed entirely out of the hands of Mr. Adam Layrie Lewis and has sent Mr. Leatham to Parliament in his stead, notwithstanding that the suspension of the writ for that borough for a long time after the last general election on account of proved corruption is associated with the name of that gentleman. Another stanch naval critic is debarred from entering the house, Sir James Elphinstone having lost his seat for Portsmouth, Mr. Fleece and Serjeant Gaselee (two Liberals) having been returned. Bridgwater retains Mr. Kinglake, though he stood second on the poll and below a Conservative, who has taken the place of the other late Liberal member. Although put to the crucial test of a poll, Mr. Darby Griffith has been saved for the new Parliament by a tie, and the Conservatives will be glad to find he gives the electors a taste of that quality which so endeared him to the late House of Commons; and being well known in talking without the faintest idea of wheedling the noise and interruption about him, he pressed his opponent down, taking his address section by section and mauling him into pulp. Here, perhaps, is an appropriate place to pay a tribute to a fellow Parliamentary veteran. Mr. Augustus Smith will be heard no more by select audiences of ten or twelve in the House; for he has retired, and will not be in the seat for Truro, which is now occupied by Captain Vivian, who once before sat for the borough, and was a prisoner, it seems, on board a very mobile, Army reformer. Here, too, with like fitness, it may be mentioned that in the list of candidates we have discovered a name knocked out with the hint of Mr. Darby Griffith well given to posterity: for amongst the candidates for Totnes we find Colonel Bawden, who used to be hero of the House by the walk he made, and who, if he gets into Parliament in the hope that he will be able to enact a persistent grievance, will find that, of all ways of getting on before the House, his attempting to do it himself will be the very worst. The anti-income-tax party in Parliament is not seriously hit. Mr. Wilfred Lawson having been costed at Carlisle by a Conservative (Mr. Hodgson), and his mighty lop and his mouth be heard in that assembly, which always accepted him and his cause from a comic point of view, with gravity. The courage which Mr. Horsman displayed in meeting the angry eyes and execrating tongues of the electors of Stroud has met its reward by his return again in very triumphant fashion, and is not an unnatural conclusion to arrive at, that the constituency, contented themselves with pelting him, were only going to give their support to a gentleman in whom they are distinguished and illustrated far beyond their local deserts in the House of Commons. Mr. Horsman is popular in his own, but not his political status, in the House, by substituting Mr. Russell Gurney and Mr. Moffatt for Sir Morton Peto and Mr. W. D. Seymour—Conservatism and Liberalism dividing the affections of the electors all. A singular parallel has been made by Bridgwater in the return of Mr. Fawcett; for, whereas he is intellectually, in the very widest sense of the term, fitted to represent any constituency and to adorn the House of Commons, he labours under a physical defect, which will render his appearance in Parliament to be one of an unprecedented character. Great as have been the troubles of Mr. Roebuck at Sheffield, owing to the pestilent tongue of an opponent, who, in his own words, was the man spake—who confessedly wounded his dignity and dared to attempt to drag him down from the pedestal on which he has so long placed himself as the model Englishman, his triumph has been secured; and Sheffield, meaning perhaps, by means, to so unwound it as not to be almost tenfold through his ordinary denunciations of all and everything which presumed to stand between him and his return, has been true to him; and it has also spared us new Parliamentary debates on that of Hadfield would have been. The Royal borough of Windsor, it may be observed, has formerly returned Conservatives and elected two Liberals, one of the sacrificed lambs being Mr. Vansittart, to whom the proprietors of the Indian Railway Company owe one of the rising hopes of the Conservatives, has lost a seat he has long held), Newport, Poole, Portsmouth, Taunton, Tynemouth, Wakefield, Wallingford, Windsor, Ilchester, Lincoln, Ashburton, and Leicester, making a total of 24. Though these seventy-nine members are not lost, they are peaceably conducted: though, to be sure, it was necessary to bring troops into the place and to read the Riot Act at Nottingham, and the hustings were torn down at Grantham.

Advices received here from Matamoros to the 23th ult. confirm the defeat of Negrete and the imperial occupation of Chihuahua. Juarez had fled.

A telegram announces a hurricane at the Cape of Good Hope on the 17th of May, during the raging of which eighteen vessels were wrecked, among them being the mail-steamer Athenian, from London.

The annual meeting of the governors and friends of the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital was recently held at the house of the hospital, King William-street, Charing-cross, for the purpose of receiving the reports of the treasurer, the surgeon, and the committee of management for the past year. The Marquis of Westminster, K.G., the president of the hospital, was in the chair. The report stated that the hospital was founded, and opened, in 1816, and that the receipts for the past year had been £1305, and expenditure £1037. The medical report stated that, during the year 1864, 8251 patients had received advice, or had been supplied with new spectacles. The numbers received weekly are 1700. In addition to the above, a large number of minor operations, requiring no after-treatment, were performed: these were accidents, which occur daily to engineers, mechanics, smiths, &c. It is announced that since the last annual meeting the Duke of Westminster took the chair, £500 had been received, the list also headed by a donation of £100 from the noble Duke, and numerous other annual subscriptions had been given.

THE FENIAN TELEGRAPH.—(To the Editor.)—I have just read with much interest in your Paper for July 8, the bi-agricultural notice of my interview with Colonel Patrick Donahoe, the head centre of the Irish-European Telegraph, which follows. As, however, the help given by me towards the construction of that telegraph has not been entirely of both the said articles, I trust you will do me the justice to supplement them by the following statement. The Irish-European Telegraph was begun done, Sir G. Wood, in May, 1861, commenced negotiations with the Persian Government, through Mr. Alison, the minister at that court, and with the Pasha of Bagdad through Persian Kurdistan. These negotiations were continued by the Foreign Office, and carried on by Mr. Alison, at Teheran; and as the end of May, 1864, Colonel Stewart arrived at Teheran with the necessary firman, line and superintend it should the negotiations prove successful. But the negotiations entirely failed, and in June, 1864, Mr. Alison quitted the Government, and directed Colonel Stewart and Major (now Captain) Champion, to proceed to England, to report to me, which, at that time, I was in Paris, about as advisable as the one from Athos, of which we have lately heard enough. Colonel Stewart, however, came to Paris, and I entered into the question. In June, by way of the Caspian and Russia. On the 11th of September, Colonel Stewart arrived at Teheran, and immediately with the Persian Government for the construction of a telegraph line through Persia on more advantageous terms than those granted to Mr. Reuter, and which would have secured the success of the undertaking. Colonel Stewart and Major Champion were appointed to carry the line through Persia, but to avoid breaches of faith as to stations to which you the noble from Bushir, it may therefore, I think, have claim to have rendered no mean service to Government, and to have laid the foundation on which Colonel Stewart built. Poland, Colonel Stewart himself tentioned to this, as will be seen in the following letter.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully, Edward B. Eastwick, 39, Charles-square.

Copy of a letter from Colonel P. Stewart to E. B. Eastwick, Esq.,

"London, July 20, 1865.—Dear Sir,—In reply to your note of this date, I have much pleasure in stating what I know to be the case—that the conception, in virtue of which we are now enabled to control and direct the construction of the proposed Persian telegraph between Khanakan and Bushire, was originated and carried out entirely by yourself. There can be no doubt of the importance and value of this measure; and I hope that, through it, we shall be enabled very greatly to add to the security of future communications with India.—I have, &c. (Signed) P. Stewart."

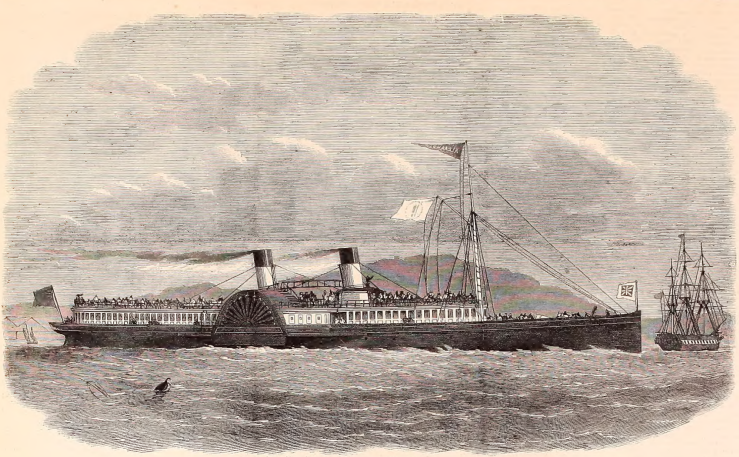
In our Paper of Feb. 11 we gave the portraits of the select marksmen of the volunteer force in the province of Ontario who had gained the prize in the international match against New South Wales. The name of Lieutenant-Colonel John Middleton, of Toronto, of the volunteer artillery corps, was accidentally omitted from the list.



A fire broke out last Monday on the 22nd ult. at Price-de-ville, Quebec, near the Bishop's school-house. Aided by a strong wind, it swept along the narrow street (Grande Campagne), and, owing to the scarcity of water, could be done to stop it. Eventually it extended over nearly half a mile, and more than one hundred houses, and 500 families lost their homes.

Professor W. A. Miller, the president of the Chemical Society, has laid before that society and published in its journal some observations on the rainfall of the metropolis, which, as he remarks, are the result of the only series of properly conducted and uninterrupted meteorological records. He states the best methods for ascertaining in waters the colour, taste, odour, and hardness, together with the amount of chlorine, nitrogen, organic matter, carbonic acid, oxygen, gaseous bodies, nitrites and nitrates, lead, and saline constituents; and concludes with a comparison of the rainfall in Greenwich and London.

The annual business meeting of the members of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science was held, on Thursday week, at their office, 29, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall, George Godwin, F.R.S., in the chair. The report stated that the meetings during the year had been generally well attended, and the discussions had been carried on with much spirit. The income for 1864, including a surplus of £1000 from the previous year, had amounted to a total receipt of £2167. After defraying all expenses, there remained a balance of £1000, and the subscriptions were estimated at £1044. The total liabilities amounted to £431. Mr. George W. Hastings, general secretary, explained that the balance in the hands of the treasurer was £1000, and was also devoted to a want of prosperity, and stated that the association was never in a more flourishing condition. Lord Brougham was re-elected president by acclamation.

A fatal accident of noble daring on the part of a fire-escape conductor calls for record. On Tuesday morning a fire broke out on the premises of Messrs. Dodd and Co., Cornhill, Lincoln. As the flames began to break the inmates were roundly alarmed, and with great difficulty were made aware of their danger. Among the sufferers were Mrs. Dodd and her children, and immediately placed it against the burning building, throwing his lily below up to the upper windows, where it was to be caught by the firemen. He again threw up his machine, and brought down five other children, amidst great cheering. The fire was still raging when he again went up with his escape, and brought down Mr. and Mrs. Warren. He also made a search for other persons, but finding the flames and smoke too overpowering, and the inmates were then got out in safety, but the premises were burnt down.

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by Prince Arthur, the Duke of Cambridge, the Prince of Saxe-Weimar, the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Cambridge, Prince Teck, visited Aldershot on Wednesday week, when a grand military display by the troops at the station took place. The Royal party rode to Farnborough Hill, and lunched with the Empress early at 8897, and formed up as follows: Royal Horse Artillery on the right in open column of sections, the other columns of sections on the left. The field batteries in the centre, and the Infantry (twelve battalions) on the left in contiguous columns of companies. The whole of the troops were then formed up in line, and marched past in review order, and then advanced at a gallop with the colours, as is usual at Royal inspections of troops. The Royal party were then conducted to the Royal enclosure, after which the division marched past. The march past was performed in a most steady and brilliant manner, and elicited frequent words of approbation from the Royal visitors. The cavalry and artillery afterwards tested past in open column of companies, the appearance of the troops in this last movement being exceedingly fine. Lieutenant-General Sir John Pennefather now assumed command of the division, and preparations were rapidly made for carrying out the details of a grand sham fight. The plan of action appeared to be as follows: A general from the hilly plateau to the north of the Royal Military Camp, which was supposed to be defended by an army already posted on the ridge of hills mentioned. The whole of the movements and evolutions in connection with the sham fight were of a very effective and spirited description, and excited great interest among those who witnessed them. The field movements concluded at half-past two o'clock.

THE SALOON STEAM-PACKET COMPANY'S VESSEL ALEXANDRA, FOR PASSENGER TRAFFIC ON THE THAMES.

THE SALOON STEAM-PACKET COMPANY'S VESSEL ALEXANDRA.

THE Alexandra, as shown in our Engraving, differs much from any other class of steam-boat employed in passenger traffic on the river Thames. As this is the first vessel which the Saloon Steam-packet Company have started here, we have thought it worthy of an Illustration. We must add a few particulars relating to the dimensions of this vessel. The length of the Alexandra is 240 ft., and her breadth 22 ft. 9 in. She is estimated at 140-horse power, nominal, and she is capable of travelling at the rate of nearly twenty miles an hour. Her burden is 157·29 tons, and, being flat bottomed, her draught of water is scarcely 4 ft. This is considered a great advantage, and one which forms a special feature in the vessel's construction, as the steam-ships at present on the Thames have sharp keels, and could not, therefore, be rendered capable of carrying the weight of a deck saloon. This deck saloon, formed upon the plan of the "hurricane decks" known in America, constitutes the great novelty which the directors have sought to introduce into this country. In this case they have adapted a vessel, originally intended for a blockade-runner, to the peaceful purpose of conveying passengers from London Bridge to Gravesend. The vessel is substantially built, and her "fittments" and decorations are ingenious and tasteful, without being unnecessarily costly, while the general arrangements for her management are such as will secure the favour of the public. The vessel is constructed for carrying 1048 passengers, and these can be so distributed that there need be no apprehension of "over-crowding." The builders of the vessels were Messrs. Kirkpatrick and M'Intyre, of Port Glasgow; and Messrs. Smith and Co., of Greenock, constructed the engines, which are on the diagonal oscillating principle.

ENTERTAINMENT OF THE AGENTS OF THE LONDON CITY MISSION.

On Thursday week Mr. Gurney Barclay (of the firm of Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, and Co.), with his excellent lady, invited the 390 agents of the London City Mission to spend their customary annual holiday at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Barclay, at Leytonstone. A special train was accordingly engaged to convey this large party from the Bishopsgate station of the Great Eastern Railway. By twelve o'clock the beautifully laid-out grounds of Mr. Barclay began to assume a very animated appearance; and for a time the healthful game of football or cricket, or the delightful stroll through the beautiful conservatories, consoled those who are accustomed to pursue their benevolent labours amid scenes of squalor and vice in the back slums of this crowded city. At the sound of a gong, however, they were soon all collected in a spacious marquee which had been erected in the grounds. Here were six or seven tables spread for an abundant and most palatable repast, which the missionaries knew how to enjoy. A photograph of the scene having been secured (from which our illustration is taken), the company again dispersed themselves over the grounds until five o'clock, when, tea having been served, suitable addresses were delivered by Mr. Barclay, Lord Radstock, the Rev. S. Minton, and the Rev. J. Offord, and the day's proceedings were concluded with a hearty vote of thanks to the worthy host and hostess. A few minutes sufficed again to transport the missionaries from this pleasant mansion and garden among the green fields of Essex to the less agreeable neighbourhoods of Bethnal-green, Whitechapel, or Drury-lane, where where they are appointed to toil for the moral and religious benefits of the poor. We are informed that each of these 200 missionaries is accustomed, upon the average, to visit once a month about 500 families, or 2000 persons. Their work is to pioneer a path among the most wretched and debased of the population, in which the regular ministrations of the Church or of the ministers of Christianity belonging to other religious communions may in due time follow. They read the Scriptures, pray with and exhort the people, give them tracts, see that the children go to school, and that every family is possessed of a copy of the Bible. They attend the death-beds of those who are dying uncared for, and hold meetings for prayer and exposition for the benefit of the poor whom they can collect in rooms within their own district, and who would otherwise neglect public worship. Eleven clergymen of the Established Churches of England and Scotland, and eleven Dissenting ministers, are examiners of the qualifications and ability of the missionaries; and the committee is composed of an equal number of members of the Established Church and of Dissenters; while among the missionaries are found Churchmen, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Wesleyans, and Baptists, all harmoniously working together. It appears that since the mission was formed 26,249,390 visits and calls have been paid to the poor, of which 3,195,571 have been to the sick and dying; 4,543,269 meetings have been held for prayer and expounding the Scriptures; 37,611,431 tracts have been given away, and 159,855 copies of the Scriptures distributed.

ENTERTAINMENT GIVEN BY MR. GURNEY BARCLAY, AT LEYTONSTONE, TO THE AGENTS OF THE LONDON CITY MISSION.

PRIZE GIVEN BY THE EDITORS OF THE "SPECTATOR" TO BE SHOT FOR AT THE WIMBLEDON RIFLE MEETING.

THE "SPECTATOR" PRIZE FOR THE RIFLE
MEETING AT WIMBLEDON.

Our Engraving represents the design of the shield and ewer which the editors of the Spectator have given as a prize to be shot for at the Wimbledon Meeting of the National Rifle Association this week. This prize is adjudged to the marksman who has made the greatest number of points in five shots (without the back-sight being raised), at any distance between 200 and 800 yards, as the officer in charge of the squad may direct. The material of both the shield and the ewer is bronze, and the embossed figures are in silver. They are copies of originals in the Louvre; the style of the workmanship is called the Brûle, and the originals are about two centuries old. These reproductions are executed by Messrs. Elkington and Co., of Regent-street.

THE YOUNG AFRICAN ELEPHANT IN THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS.

THE Zoological Society's collection of living animals in Regent's Park has just received a very important addition in the shape of the young African elephant represented in the accompanying Illustration. Although the society's gardens have never been without specimens of the Indian elephant since their first opening to the public, some thirty-five years ago no example of the African species has been previously exhibited in them, nor, we believe, has such an animal ever been previously brought to England alive. At, however, the African elephant is very distinct in its outer form as well as in its internal structure from the Indian species, the council of the society have long been desirous of bringing the two elephants together side by side in the gardens. With this object they have on several occasions offered handsome sums for the acquisition of a specimen of the African animal. These measures, however, were productive of no results; and it is only within the last few weeks that the council of the society succeeded in obtaining an African elephant from the Jardin des Plantes, Paris, in exchange for an Indian rhinoceros. The animal thus acquired is a young male, supposed to be five or six years old. He is nearly the same size as the smaller of the two Indian elephants now in the society's collection. When the two are placed together, as is the case every day, for some hours, the differences between them are very striking. The most obvious peculiarity of the African species consists in the enormous ears, which cover the whole side of the head. The general outline of the two species is likewise very different, as is also the form of the trunk and the shape of the forehead.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1865.

THE voice of the Returning Officer rises high above all other utterances, and few of us care to listen to much else. Out of the Babel cries that rage around the hustings he culls extracts a dozen words of result, and we learn who are to go up for us, after the winter, and sit in the great council. At this time, and just between the city and country contests, it would not be very useful, even for Mr. Mill himself, to ask people to follow an argument, or to go to the bottom of a subject. We only want to know "who's in for Fortywinks."

It is too soon to begin to take stock of the new House of Commons. Before this can be done equably, we should like to see whether there has been any great disturbance in the balance of parties, what has been the fate of the Conservative reaction which we have been so solemnly assured was on its trial, and whether the new forces in the House are powerful enough to compel new action. But we may note, with satisfaction, certain elections, because they indicate an advanced sense of responsibility on the part of large constituencies, and in so far they are arguments in favour of those who believe that something more than the mere external conduct of the masses has appeared during the past few years. For instance, look at the city of London. The gentleman who has been returned at the very top of the poll, over the old, tried, wealthy candidates, is, emphatically, the ablest man of the whole list. He is not the youngest, and he cannot be said to have been taken into the representation at the eleventh hour. Mr. Goschen, highly educated, eloquent, and clearheaded, is returned as the head of the list, the world-famous name and honourable wealth of Baron Rothschild merely placing him at the foot. This is the City's homage to brains. In Westminster, John Stuart Mill has been returned, without any personal exertion on his own part beyond a few speeches towards the work of the election. He was unknown, save by reputation, to the vast majority of the voters; but they saw who were interested for him, and wisely obeyed the leadership of their best fellow-citizens. He, the retired philosopher, has been sought by the same number, within a fraction, that voted for the aristocratic candidate, whose family owns a province of houses, and whose agents have been exerting themselves for months, and raising all the influence they could command. Mr. Grantham, Mr. Thomas Hughes, chiefly known as a delightful writer, but with a certain reputation for having studied political economy, has achieved a remarkable triumph in a constituency hitherto held by a strong Tory influence. He has come in at the very top of the poll, higher than an old member, and defeating a candidate whose wealth had enabled him to appeal with a natural confidence to the country. They have preferred the man of brains. In Finsbury, again, the voters seem to have been anxious to shake off the discredit of only choosing medicorities. Mr. Torrens, who is really a statesman, offers himself, and he receives the very largest number of votes: and Mr. Cox, the attorney, is ignominiously ejected—the constituency not only electing the best man, but marking their sense of the proceeding that deprived us of the services of Mr. Cox. Mr. Layard, in Marylebone, stands high. Layard has been elected without opposition, we have completed the noteworthy features in the metropolitan elections; and we rejoice that London has awaked, and, by its selections of representatives, has proclaimed that the largest number of votes no longer be open to the taunt that it returns nobodies. The names of Goschen, Mill, Hughes, Torrens, and Layard furnish a more than sufficient answer.

Some of the other elections have also already vindicated the sound sense of the people. Mr. Fawcett has been chosen for Brighton, and the selection does honour to the constituency. Here is a gentleman whom accident has—shall we say, condemned to the blinker. He is chosen by the advice of the gayest and most frivolous place in England. Mr. Trevelyan, whose name has an hereditary weight, but who is best known as an author, has been elected, and we have a right to expect much from him. Mr. William Gladstone has been brought in—a perfectly untried and very young man—for Chester; and the constituency which has assented to the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that arts should be brought to the business of politics has also taken care that the appointee for whom Chester is responsible shall come of a good stock. It so happens that the gentlemen whom we have named are all Liberals; but it is not to be the policy of the electors of England if Conservative men, with brains in their heads, will not come forward. There is every inclination, we think, on the part of the voters to disparage the accidental claims of birth and wealth, and to make politics a matter of a free judgment. In numerous cases, of course, all the old forces have come into play, and have succeeded, as they must do while electors are but men. But we have no hesitation in saying that this general liberty proves the existence of a very healthy state of mind throughout the country.

Some of the rejections, also, are significant; but we do not desire to dwell upon them unnecessarily. Those who admire two forms of Conservative and Liberal will be pleased to see that Mr. Whalley and Mr. Darby Griffith are returned for Peterborough and Devizes, so that Protestantism may be considered tolerably safe, and our home, foreign, and colonial departments will be regularly inspected and overhauled. Alderman Rose and Mr. Digby Seymour have been dismissed by Southampton. The defeat of Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald at Horsham is much more to be regretted, as he is an able gentleman, and has served in the climate of weapons. Some Conservative magnate had better displace a hanger-on, or pet captain, and put in Mr. Fitzgerald, who has done service. Mr. Richardson, also, has served many gallant fights waged in vain, and will do his party credit. The valiant Roebuck is at the very top of the poll, but continues to breathe flames, like Cacus, against the daring person who has ventured to oppose him. Mr. Dalkis is not "Number one" at Thetford, nor even number two. Blatant Mr. Ferrand has again got into the house for Devonport: it is a misfortune to those who have ears and good taste, but we cannot have everything our own way in this world. Mr. Lawson has been thrown out, and it is sought to show that his temperance views have rendered him unacceptable. The sweet and flowery eloquence of Mr. Mason Jones is not to be heard in the house: Coventry will not have him, though his style was that of a watered and variegated ribbon. Mr. Frederick Peel has been turned out of Bury, but by a Liberal—a seat will probably be found for a useful if not a very popular man. The name of Cobbett is no longer a charm at Oldham. Such are among the incidents which have already marked the great contest. The struggle at Oxford University is that which will be looked to with the greatest interest, and it will be seen whether intolerance and ingratitude combined have the power to exclude a future Premier from a representation upon which he has conferred so much credit. But, so far as the battle has gone, thoughtful men have reason to be more than satisfied.

THE COURT.

THE Queen held a Council at Windsor Castle, on Thursday week, which was attended by Earl Russell, Earl Grey and Ripon, Lord Stanley of Alderley, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, and the Right Hon. W. The sponsors were conducted by Viscount Sydney to seats on the left hand of the altar. The Prince and Princess of Wales and the other members of the Royal family were conducted by Viscount Castlerosse to their appointed places in the aisle. During the entrance of the Royal family a voluntary was played upon the organ at the conclusion of which Viscount Castlerosse, Earl Spencer, and Lord Harris conducted the infant Prince into the chapel, his Royal Highness being carried by the Lady Lilford (Lady Cinde) and followed by the Countess of Macclesfield. The service was commenced with the following chorale, by his Royal Highness the Prince Consort:—

> In life's gay mazes, are we mightily yeath
> Of vice and folly to embrace?
> Oh, may thy Maker's glorious name,
> Be on thy infant mind impress'd!
> Or shall no shades of sorrow cloud
> The sunshine of thy early days;
> But happiness in endless round,
> Shall still encompass all thy ways!

When the Archbishop of Canterbury commenced the prayer, "Almighty and Everlasting God," the Queen received from the infant Prince in the arms of the Queen, who handed his Royal Highness to the archbishop.

Upon the Archbishop asking how the child should be named, the Queen answered, Guelph Frederick Peter Albert. A short service was then performed in the infant in those names. After receiving the sacred symbol, the infant Prince was returned to the arms of the Queen.

The Duke of Macclesfield as chief mourner took the Prince, who was conducted from the chapel in the same way as on entering.

The solemn prayer and blessing having been given, the Archbishop of the ceremonial concluded with a chorale. The Queen, accompanied by the Royal family and the company present, then proceeded to and retired from the chapel to the Red Drawing-room, where the baptismal register was signed. Luncheon was served in the Throne Room on the Oak-room, and for the other distinguished guests in the dining-room.

During the collation the Treasurer of the Household gave the following toasts :—

"The Royal Highness Prince George of Wales."

"The Queen."

"The Princess and Princess of Wales."

Frock dress was worn; the gentlemen of the household in the Windsor uniform.

A special train left the Paddington station for Windsor Castle at 11.30, to convey to the Queen's guests, which started from Windsor at 3.30.

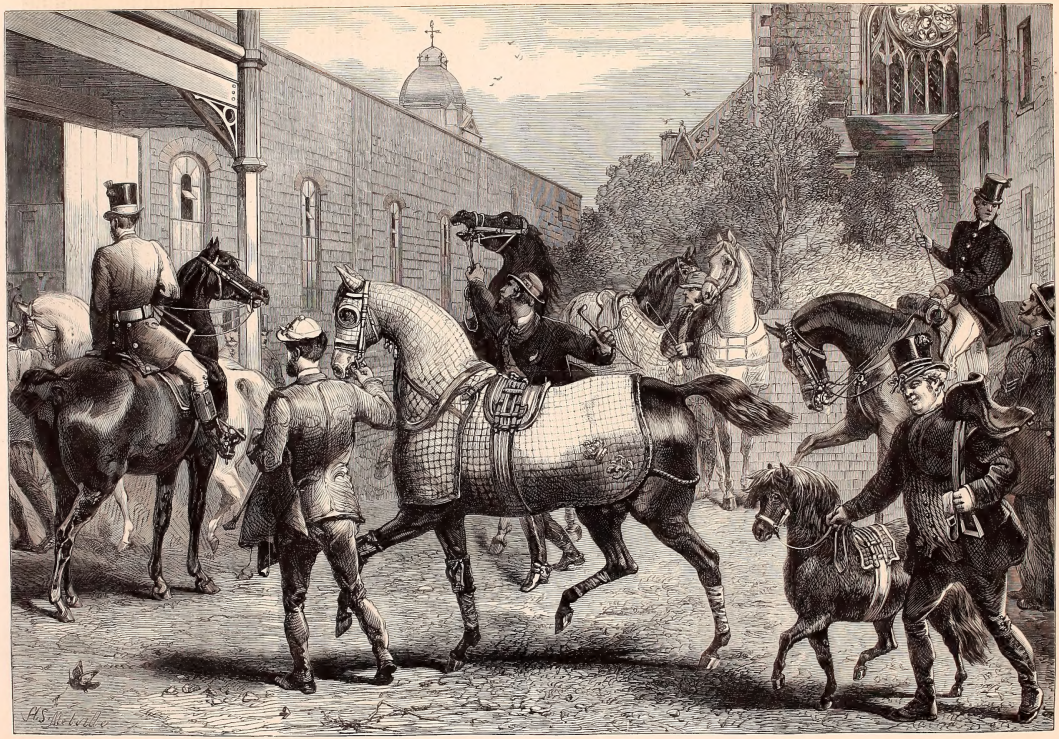
MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.



The marriage of Miss Augusta Selina Stott with Colonel the Hon. St. George Foley took place at Whitton, Middlesex, on Thursday.

The marriage of Mr. James B. Swinton, second son of Mr. John Campbell-Swinton, of Kimmerghame, Berwickshire, with Miss Mary Maclaine Pitcairnof Dr. Ros, daughter of Lord and Lady De Ros, was solemnised, on Tuesday, at St. Saviour's, Paddington, Warwick-square.

The marriage of Miss Sullivan to the Rev. Robert Baker, Vicar of Pulham, took place, on Thursday, at the parish church of Pulham St. Mary, in the presence of Viscount and Viscountess Fullarton and a large circle of friends.

The marriage of Miss Cecil Lucy with Mr. Alexander Pym, Warwick, to the interesting Arab class of last year was wanting, there were a pair of Turkish Baths and a Russian one, and not very good ones either. Eleven judges acted in all, and it was so managed that they took different classes in turn. The Prince and Princess of Wales were among the visitors on Tuesday; and, considering the mud and dust of election warfare, the Hall was well attended.

Forty-one new members were elected at the last monthly meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England. The balance in the bankers' hands was declared to be £1367, and the arrears of subscriptions £480. The warrant of the Queen appointing the Right Hon. Sir Stafford Northcote to be the Rev. J. C. ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THERE fur many fit, proper, and good candidates have been chosen members of Parliament, greatly to the credit of the electors and greatly to the disappointment of those particular crookers who will believe that money is always better than brains, and that merit lags for ever a long way behind demerit. Literary men, and we now have a large number of them in the house, should be proud of the fact that Mr. Hughes was placed at the head of the poll in Lambeth, quite as much for having written a sound, honest, manly book as for having been for some years a foremost and stanch friend of the real working man; and of the fact that the great majority of those who voted for Mr. Mill, the clearest in expression of all advanced thinkers, if not the clearest of all thinkers, he could have but a reflected fame. Mr. Mill's defeat, however, is, indeed, a bright one; because people who know that the philosopher had been a bold, honest man, who never hid behind the pen-protection of his opinion, and because, too, friends and thinkers more advanced than they owned him as their leader, have been induced to come forward and voted for the man they thought to be their best. Mr. W. H. Smith made a merry fight for Westminster, and though he was not so much grieve at being beaten by Mr. Mill as that Grosvenor should, by a coalition, win over Mr. Smith, who was one of the pets of the Lambeth, Westminster, and Finsbury elections, we shall have very little to say against what appears to be the wishes of the majorities in literature will, it is said, come into demand as representatives of the people, and unwise will they be if they obey the call. The world, after all, will miss more than it gains by losing the pen-power of Mr. Mill in Parliament. John Stuart Mill, M.P., will have hardly time to produce another sequence to his "Political Economy" treatise on Liberty, he will find how thoroughly the servant of the people gives up his own.

The results of the elections hitherto has been that the Liberals, instead of finding a falling-off, have gained numerously by it, and thus strengthen the hands of the Government; and the rejuvenescent Prime Minister, who boasts of having been returned for seven times by a town in his native Tiverton clay, may, it is to be presumed, carry on to any extent those reforms which have been hitherto looming somewhat too faintly in the future.

"When sorrows come, they come not single spies, but in battalions;" it is the case with fleas. We have had two remarkable cases in connection of the rare Bonyan tracts than the "element" again makes its presence felt; and this time not in the least expected quarter, that of all dreaded—at the British Museum. The reporters have been exceedingly reticent about this matter, and the Trustees have acted on the book-binder's shop attached to the museum. A number of the Cotton Libra were seriously injured by the late fire, and an immense number of books burnt. The fire raged for nearly three quarters of an hour without any assistance, and the damage done by water in Montague-street more than once imagined that we should have to deplore the loss of a great part of the national collection of treasures. Whether the fire was the result of accident or the hinder were burned, we of course understand that many of those books were of great value, and are, or at least were, the author of many pretensions: witness his editions of Boiardo and Aristo—the "Orlando," "Innamorato," and "Furioso"—and his translation of the first four editions of Dante. Some of the readers, grateful for the benefits which he has conferred upon them, have, it is said, "subscribed," to get up" a little testimonial to the late principal librarian.

Of course as to the occasion of the fire there will be much and his full pension, there are, of course, many. Sir Henry Rawlinson has been named, and also another present officer, but Mr. Panizzi positively assert that there will be no chief librarie, but that a Ministerial office will be created, to be filled by Mr. Lowe, whose business it will be to look after the whole of the educational and literary property of the nation and to properly represent the necessary improvements, modifications, and alterations to their several wants. Mr. Panizzi, with the various heads of the departments will, under this method, should it be adopted, be much freer from routine duties, and will be able more vigorously in their exegetic.

The combined influence of several papers, of many correspondents, and of most "active and intelligent" police-officers, having been unable to extirpate the dogs, and the Queen having been made aware that hydrophobia is as often occasioned by cats as dogs, and that last weather, on the occasion occasioning madness in the canines, affords really fewer instances of hydrophobia in October and November—all this being the case, the writer of social leaders is now attempting a crusade in favour of cats, which is declared to be made up of like hair, false teeth, pearl powder, rouge, cruelties, steel, whalebone, and other articles of the like forbidden. There is no reality in her. She is so expensive when got, so difficult to get, so unsatisfactory when got, that she is not worth the salt. She is petulant, petty, and presumptuous; she is flirting, foolish, and fickle. All that she does is to sit at a fashionable door in a carriage or a bal-room, render a man spoony and idiotic from twenty to thirty, and get him into the divorce-court for forty and fifty. These are sad words, and, to parody old Fuller's capital sermon, that be "Bad Thoughts for Worse Times." In the times of Shakspeare, Bacon, Raleigh, and Jeremy Taylor, he thought more nobly of women. But this fashion of becoming a woman-hating philosopher, has extended from Paris to London, from London to the borough-street to Marseilles. Threat the young men have bandied themselves like the negro brethren, and when a young man will marry till the women become more natural and less expensive; and even in America the President has declared that matrimony is a failure, his sister "was a modestly-dressed girl and were no hoops." Cannot the great teachers of our time, as Carlyle, Ruskin, Thackeray, Dickens, and Ruskin, come up and say something to the ladies which shall win them to a sense of the enormous crimes of which (we are told to believe) they are guilty? "We hope to hear more," as they say in the provincial papers, of this strike among the bachelors. If the spinsters could get up a decent subscription, they might send out a gun and end till some of these young jackanapes put down their nonsense, all sensible men would be delighted.

So Captain Speke's claim to be considered the African traveller, vice Barton disputed, has received a most unexpected check in the farewell by the discovery of Mr. Baker and the proof that the Nile does run through, if it does not rise in, a lake. Mr. Baker, if his account claims its source from the chain of the great American lakes. In fifty years we shall hear more of Mr. Baker. He has the true generous of his praise as Sir Roderick Murchison has been; for his discovery of a lake as long as all England seems astonishing that there must be a fertile country made healthful by that water-shed, and that it is a distant prospect of the colonization of central Africa and the final consequent elevation of the negro.

At our now happily annual national meeting of volunteers on Wimbledon-common the display of the Queen's prize and the prize amidst the generous cheers of their competitors, and a capital combined entertainment for the public. The representatives of the citizen soldiers while in camp by the St. George's volunteers. Both the gallery and the range are roofed in, and those gay and festive souls who will not be tired out by the rackety delights of the Dramatic College Fête, or the more very and bronzic pleasures of the Islington Horse Show.

The Egyptian Hall, at the Mansion House, was, on Thursday, occupied by an assembly not perhaps the most brilliant, but certainly the most useful of any in England—that is, the most useful at a particular and very unpleasant crisis which occurs to some one of us almost every night in the year. Briefly, the Lord Mayor distributed prizes to those men who had rescued lives from fire during the past year. I have before spoken of the excellent society for the preservation of life from fire, and trust that under any changes the Government may contemplate its have and efficient little brigade will be kept together.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Mr. Panizzi has resigned the office of principal librarian and secretary of the British Museum.

The first completed portion of the river wall of the Thames embankment has been uncovered. It extends about twenty yards, just in front of Whitehall, and presents a handsome appearance.

A strike has taken place in the building trade. On Monday afternoon the carpenters and joiners in the employment of the Messrs. Cubitt, builders, Grey's-inn-road, struck for an advance of their demand of an advance of wages to the extent of three farthings an hour being refused. The Master Builders' Association resolved to take up the case.

On Monday evening a fire broke out in one of the bookbinding shops of the Messrs. Remnant, in Great Queen-street, near the new road—the King's Library, and near Mr. Panizzi's residence. It is stated that they are the only bookbinders in London employed by the Queen, and consequently her fire-engines on the spot. The fire was extinguished without any serious loss of the premises.

The half-yearly general court and seventy-seventh election of the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern—the Lord Mayor in the chair—there being one children on the foundation (aged 7 years) and seventeen candidates. This asylum was instituted in the year 1827 for the gratuitous board, clothing, and education of poor children afflicted with consumption, and the diseases of the British empire.

Yesterday week being the first Friday in July, the annual procession of the mast and block makers of the port of London from Wapping to the borders of Epping Forest took place. The procession, which consisted of numbers of boats mounted on wheels and drawn by teams of horses, accompanied by bands of music, the latter playing national and popular airs, started with flags, passed along Mile-end-road, through Stratford, Bow, &c., to the line of route being lined with people, by the way. Loughton Forest, where once stood the famed Fairlop oak, and contiguous to which, despite the axe of the destroyer, a portion of it still remains.

At the meeting of the Archæological Institute, held yesterday week, Mr. G. R. Corner, F.S.A., read a paper on "Roman Remains," and a paper on the history and antiquities of Aylesbury, illustrative of the architectural drawings of Mr. Buckler, was read by Mr. Parker, F.S.A. Mr. Hawkins read a paper on "Ancient Sculptures found in Egypt, Assyria, Persia, and Rome and antiquities in the British Museum, described." Richard Stevens to Rudeing, Archæological Institute, and in the course of archæological visits in the Lewes; and Mr. E. Smirke, vice-warden of the Stannaries, described Pevensey Castle. Baden Hollowell read a paper on Pevensey Castle, during the present year, at Polesden, in Cornwall, and sent for exhibition on the occasion by the Rev. Mr. Hawkins.

A public meeting in furtherance of a working man's exhibition was held on Tuesday evening at Sussex Hall, Leadenhall-street, City—the Lord Mayor in the chair. Mr. Cubitt, M.P., Mr. Alderman Sir Chas. Lawrence, Mr. Alderman Wire, M.P., and Mr. Hawkins, M.P., were among the speakers. The object of the meeting was to raise a sum sufficient to guarantee the expenses of the exhibition, which is to be opened in the course of the present month. The exhibition is to be open to the working classes only, and the profits are to be devoted to the establishment of a working man's institute.

The births of 1993 children—1005 boys and 988 girls—were registered in London during the week that ended on Saturday last, July 8, in the corresponding week in 1854, 1844 births were registered, and corrected for increase of population, was 1827. The deaths registered in London during the week were 1,000, of which 1,000 were of persons above the age of ten years (corrected) in 1852. The high temperature which has recently prevailed has caused a considerable increase in the mortality. The principal causes by the deaths from diarrhœa in the last four weeks. The weeks from 1849, 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853, and 1854 together. The epidemic died from cholera last week. Fifty-nine deaths occurred from typhus, 17 from scarlatina, and 15 from measles. The deaths from violence were reported in the week. The daughter of a bricklayer, aged eight years, died from the effects of a burn, her clothes having caught fire from a candle. A dog-cart, driven by Mr. Alderman Sir Benjamin Hall, has been run over and killed in Bishopsgate-street. The object of the show was to stimulate the poorer classes to keep their children clean and neat, and to cultivate a taste of ground as may be attached to their cottages, but also to improve their taste in the growth of flowers. The number of children who competed ranged from 60, in the highest class to 15 in the lowest. The district, however, being extensive, and the children scattered over a wide area, and not very satisfactory, there being no less than 150 exhibitors, of whom ninety were children of workhouse inmates, who received the "dividends" at the show. The Earl of Shaftesbury distributed the prizes. His Lordship stated that this was the first time that workhouse children had been admitted during the week.

The 25th anniversary festival of the Licensed Victuallers' School was celebrated, on Wednesday, at the Crystal Palace. Mr. Spencer Thornton, Mr. Alderman Sir Benjamin Hall, and Mr. Alderman Wire were upwards of 1600 of the subscribers and friends of the institution present. The children, 300 in number, the sons and daughters of deceased or living licensed victuallers, members of the society, become reduced in circumstances. From the year 1827 to the present time 1,200 children have been admitted on the foundation, and 1,000 have been apprenticed. The average expenditure for the last three years has been £3,000 per annum. Of this sum £1,000 arises from the dividends on the permanent fund, £1,000 from the annual subscriptions of the Licensed Victuallers' School," after dwelling upon the excellent nature of the institution as to the health children were examined by doctors, and seven and twelve years, the boys remaining until they were fourteen, and the girls until they had attained the age of fifteen. He dwelt upon the merits of all the arrangements connected with the establishment, there was one thing he had not yet mentioned—namely, the fact that it was the magnificent support which the school derived from the great body of licensed victuallers. There were numerous subscriptions from the country districts, in London and its neighbourhood, and yet not more than one-third of that body contributed to the support of the school. He was sorry to observe that the noble example which had been set by the Queen's subscription of the Licensed Victuallers' Society had so justly gained the approbation of the public. Her Majesty, he understood, had not only given the annual subscription received, amounting in the aggregate to about £800, towards which sum the licensed victuallers of his district had contributed the handsome contribution of £1041. In the course of the evening the children of the school were interrogated, and answered in a manner which gave the highest satisfaction. A peculiarity studied by the governors, they all bore the appearance of being in good health, and seemed to enjoy themselves. The musical arrangements contributed to the support of the institution. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Land, and the vocal performances were agreeably entertained by the juvenile band of the school, whose performances on them did credit to their instructor.

LAW AND POLICE.—Lord Cranworth was sworn into office as Lord Chancellor, on Saturday last, and took his seat on the woolsack. He immediately afterwards proceeded with the business of the Court.

An important case was heard in the Lord Chief Justice yesterday week. An artist named Percy claimed £10,000 from the Great Eastern Railway Company as damages for the loss of a picture which he had painted, and which he held when coming up from Harwich to London. These injuries were such as satisfied him (considering his professional position) that he was in the situation as drawing-master on board the Britannia training-vessel for naval cadets. The jury awarded him £5,000 damages and costs of suit.

The Master of the Rolls gave judgment, on Monday, in a complicated case of considerable interest, involving the question of the validity of a marriage between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant. Mr. Beaumont's grandson, Lord Emlin, was to take the whole benefit of the will, or whether the testator were to take any interest under it. The decision was given in favour of Lord Emlin.

In the Exchequer Court, last Saturday, before Mr. Registrar Pepys, was held a first sitting for proof of debts and choice of assignees under the bankruptcy of the Hon. Richard Bethell, eldest son of the late Lord Chancellor. The petitioning creditor is Mr. Attenborough, of Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-square, and the creditor who effected Mr. Bethell's arrest is Mr. Tatee, of Shirley-street, Cavendish-square, money lender. The bankrupt was released from custody about three weeks since, and the petition has been allotted to Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, in consequence of a relationship existing between the bankrupt and Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque, the other Commissioner Winslow's court. No statement has yet been filed of the bankrupt's liabilities, but the amount is roughly estimated at £20,000. To a proof of debt presented by Mr. Anderson, of Throgmorton-street, stockbroker, for £321, it was objected they arose out of gambling transactions. Mr. Registrar Pepys said that if the consistence were fairly proved by the brokers it would not be necessary to enter upon any question of conduct on the part of the bankrupt. Mr. Bethell, however, in some of the creditors, said that the claims of the brokers were partly made up of money paid on behalf of the bankrupt for his losses. The registrar adjourned the consideration of the proofs. The following proofs were admitted:—Mr. C. H. Attenborough, £1,000, money lent and interest; Mr. Robert Attenborough, £500, money lent; Messrs. Howard and Sons, £212, for furniture; Mr. E. J. Davis, £81, for coals; Messrs. Rout and Bell, £21, for cigars; Sir William Foster, £315, money lent and interest; and Sir Richard Duckworth Bing, £1,625, money lent and interest. The choice of assignees was then adjourned until Saturday next.

There was tried in the Court of Common Pleas, on Monday, in which Mr. Serjeant Byles and Mr. Serjeant Parry appeared. The original action was to recover the sum of £1,000, the amount due from the Rome Secretary had neglected his duty in not laying Mr. Bernard's letter before the Queen. The plaintiff was in nothing but the Queen's Bench prison. The jury, after the learned counsel gave a verdict for Sir George, and Mr. Irwin now sought a new trial, on the ground that the case was improperly submitted to a common jury. The Court, however, refused to entertain the application, and the original judgment was affirmed.

The Earl of Winchilsea appeared, last Saturday, before the police magistrate of Worship-street, to answer a charge preferred against him by a porter on the railway platform. His defence was that the practice was common, which was not denied, but the magistrate said that the statute said that he checked if as much as possible. The magistrate admitted there was some truth in the plea, but that a bad habit was not justified by being universal. The fine was fixed 40s. and costs.

The city police-court has made a raid on the betting-houses within their jurisdiction. Several offenders against the Betting House Act were brought up, and fined £5 each, with costs. Among the number was a gentleman who paid down £20 sterling.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Wednesday, Mr. Debenham was put on his trial for the manslaughter of a man named Solomons, whom he shot with a revolver, while in the act of committing a burglary in the house of his employer, in the city of London. The jury, after some deliberation, acquitted the prisoner.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

On Saturday last the Bishop of Winchester consecrated the new church of St. Mary Magdalene, Bermondsey-street.

The Queen has issued her congé d'élire to the Dean and Chapter of Bristol, on the recommendation of Dr. Jacobson, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, to the vacant see.

The Bishop of London invited the whole of the clergy of the diocese of London to meet him, at eleven o'clock, on Tuesday morning, at Fulham Palace last Saturday afternoon.

The Rev. John Keith, of St. Mary's Church, Aberdeen Park, Highbury, was laid, on Wednesday week, by the Rev. Prebendary Morrice, rector of Hoxton, and the new church will be erected.

The Rev. H. C. Watson, on his resigning the senior curacy of St. John's, Clerkenwell, was presented with a coffee-pot and cream-jug, and a tankquee, with a purse containing £100, by the congregation.

The church of Easthampstead, Berks, being in a very dilapidated condition, the parishioners, headed by their rector, Mr. Bishopsmire, Sir W. O. Hayter, and other proprietors have decided upon rebuilding and enlarging the edifice, at a considerable expense.

The newly erected Church of St. James, Gateshead, was consecrated, on Monday, by the Bishop of Durham. The ceremony was in connection with one of the four ecclesiastical districts formed out of the parish, a province which contains 30,000 souls.

The trustees and friends of the Bristol Royal Infirmary have presented Alan Reece, Esq., with his portrait, as a token of their regard, as a mark of their appreciation of his services, especially during the late fever visitation, in the midst of multiplied duties in the office of medical charge of air and rest.

The clergy and friends of Christchurch Schools, St. George's-in-the-East, were taken for their annual excursion, on Thursday week, by steamer to Greenwich, Blackwall, and Essex. They numbered upwards of 1600 in all, and was accompanied by the clergy of the district and the above-mentioned. The children were provided with refreshments during the day by private contributions. On Friday the infants, to the number of 420, had their annual treat at Hampstead.

On Thursday week the foundation-stone of the new chancel of St. Peter's Church, Cranley-gardens, was laid by the Bishop of London and Chandos. During the last six months the church has been undergoing complete alteration, and the chancel, at the time of the Gothic consecration of the work, according to Mr. Scott's design, will involve a very considerable expense. The whole of the expenses of the alterations have, however, sufficient has been subscribed to justify a beginning, and already nine contributions have been received. A letter was read from Lord Ashley, Mr. J. G. Hubbard, mayor for Buckingham, has given £100 towards the work, and the Bishop of London £50. This contribution is towards the alteration of the body of the church, exclusive of his gift, the chancel.

On Wednesday week the consecration of a burial ground in the Chapter-house of York Minster—the Archbishop presiding. Archdeacon Hawks moved the first resolution, which was to the effect that the ceremony in which was a declaration to be subscribed by any person entering the cemetery, that he would not allow any religious service to be read to the Book of Common Prayer and of ordering of Bishops, Priests and Deacons, and believed the doctrines of the Church of England to be founded on the Word of God, as set forth, to be agreeable to the Word of God. The Venerable Archdeacon Lee seconded the motion. The Rev. Dr. Hook, of Leeds, in a long speech, with verbal alterations, were adopted. Archdeacon Croyke proposed that, in the case of any person who had been baptized by a dissenting minister, the making of the burial rites used by the minister of such person on his behalf, made any payment, would, on presentation to that effect, be read over the grave. The Rev. Mr. Hawkins seconded the motion, which was agreed to. The Rev. J. Bell, on behalf of the clergy of the archdeaconry of Craven, presented a petition against the adoption of the scheme. On the motion of Mr. Bansloph, seconded by the Rev. C. Colet, it was agreed that the address to be presented to the Archbishop should be signed by the members of the Court by him relating to simony urgently requires revision. Archdeacon Croyke's motion was then carried unanimously. This concluded the proceedings.

The following preferments and appointments have recently taken place:—The Rev. Thomas Jones to be Precentor of the cathedral of Ely. The Rev. Lewis, Rector of Lampeter Velfrey, to be Rural Dean of Narberth. The Rev. J. Bell, Rector of Ashby-cum-Cumberworth, to be Archdeacon of Craven. The Rev. J. Tate to Cranton, Northumberland. The Rev. J. Bell, Rector of Ashby-cum-Cumberworth, to be Archdeacon of Craven

THE PRIZE MEETING OF THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION AT WIMBLEDON.

FIRST DAY.

MONDAY being the opening day of the Wimbledon meeting, the shooting did not present any feature of great public interest. The greater part of the time and attention of the volunteers was devoted to the arrangement of the camp, which this year assumes very formidable dimensions, upwards of 800 officers and men being under canvas. The increase in the numbers has compelled the association to take up ground considerably beyond the usual limits of the camp, and the same time the various tents of members of the association are more numerous than before. The tents for camping out grown every year, and the opportunities which Wimbledon affords for this invigorating al-fresco mode of existence must make it every year more valuable to the volunteers. The readiness with which the members of the various corps adapt themselves to the requirements and exigencies of camp life is remarkable, and this is in itself no unimportant part of the training of this auxiliary branch of the military service. In a temporary encampment like that set up, a trench dug round, and the turf piled, and in not a few cases flowering plants laid on air of domestication is imparted to the canvas dwelling on the wild common. All the appliances of modern cooking are rapidly supplied, and the Victoria Regiment, Surrey, and other corps maintain a pleasant competition in the cultivation of the arts of the cuisine, and seek to earn for themselves a well-deserved character for welcome and duly appreciated hospitality.

The principal competition on Monday was that between the representatives of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, the conditions of which, singularly enough, fell to one of the Cambridge six, although the aggregate score of Oxford exceeded by two points that of their sister University. The following are the details of the shooting :—

OXFORD.

* The competition for the Middlesex bronze medal was attended with the following results :—

Sergeant A. Anderson, 22nd Middlesex (winner of bronze medal, £5) 45
Sergeant W. Mackie, London Scottish (winner of £3) 40
Private G. James, 22nd Middlesex (winner of £2) 40
Private J. Cooper, 19th Middlesex (winner of £1) 39

Colour-Sergeant Cross, London Rifle Brigade, was the winner of the City of London bronze medal, with a score of 43. The Tower Hamlets bronze medal was carried off by Private Barkley, with a total score of 41.

In addition to the foregoing contests, an all-comers' county match took place between eight representative teams of the following counties—Aberdeenshire, Gloucestershire, Lancashire, Middlesex, Surrey, and West York. The ten scores of each team of one half the entrance fees, to be paid to the winning squad, was carried off by Lancashire with a large majority. The result was—Aberdeenshire, 484; Gloucestershire, 471; Lancashire, 516; Middlesex, 476; Surrey, 400; West York, 455.

SECOND DAY.

Tuesday's shooting began shortly after nine o'clock a.m., and the clock was on the stroke of ten before the last competitor could be finally released from their butts. The evening, however, was fine, and the light admirable, so that, except for the delayed duration of the match, no inconvenience was suffered.

The forenoon was occupied for the most part with the competition for the prize presented by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, which, apart from the distinction conferred upon the winner, carries with it the not inconsiderable gratification of a cash payment. For this prize were limited to holders of National Rifle Association bronze and silver medals, and therefore competitors from all parts of the kingdom, to whom were added two silver medallists from her Majesty's Indian territories. The two highest scores were made by Sergt. Mayo, Somerset, 45; Sergeant W. May, 5th Sussex, 45. On shooting off the tie, Private Mayo became the victorious.

The contest for the possession of the St. George's challenge vase, which is open to one of the competitors who shall make the highest aggregate score in four of the ordinary competitions, and which becomes the property of the winner, was won for Staffordshire.

The Queen's Prize, which opens to—of all competitors the representatives of every rifle corps in the kingdom, was also entered upon on Tuesday. The vase was won for Staffordshire.

The Queen's Prize, which opens to—of all competitors the representatives of every rifle corps in the kingdom, was also entered upon on Tuesday. The vase was won for Staffordshire. The sixty best shots in the list of those of the competitors who made creditable scores on a future day for the dragon cup, value £50, which becomes the property of the winner. The competition for this prize is open to all.

Sergeant T. Perner, 4th Stafford, winner of gold vase, gold jewel, and £6 .. 36

Private H. Browne, 1st Lanark, winner of £1 33
Lieutenant S. G. Proctor, 14th Worcester, winner of £2 33
Colour-Sergeant Cumberland, Robin Hood, winner of £2 .. 14th and 15th .. 33
Sergeant T. Hingston, 11th Suffolk, winner of £2 33
Captain W. R. Clark, 3rd London, winner of £2 33
Lieutenant H. Wallis, 19th West York, winner of £2 33
Captain R. R. W. Crewe, 37th Middlesex, winner of £2 32
Private W. Cross, 5th Gloucester, winner of £2 32
Private V. Crozier, 5th Gloucester, winner of £2 32

The public schools contest, always a central point of interest in the proceedings at Wimbledon, was entered upon at three o'clock. On this occasion the weather enjoyed the most favourable day for keeping the shield in its own possession, but of carrying off, through the best shot of the youngest Eton, Mr. Lyttelton, the prize. The determination of the match the representative elevens were, as usual, entertained by—and an hour or two after the contest the visitors drove away from the common with the Harrow colours displayed and the rank—and—file with Harrow boys cheering earnestly in honour of Lord Elcho, at whose intercession an extension of holidays had been obtained in honour of the signal victory achieved by the sons. The total scores made on behalf of the schools respectively were—Harrow, 216; Marlborough, 209; Rugby, 204; Winchester, 198; Eton, 193; Cheltenham, 186.

The international Enfield contest was one that excited even more widespread interest than the match between the public schools, appealing as it did to love of country. When fortune finally declared itself in favour of the Scotch, a large number of those who had laid the two rival nationalities by the Irish squad; and the compliment having been very heartily reciprocated, the festivities respectively adjourned to a late dinner, or rather supper, in company, with a view of cementing the entente cordiale. The total scores were—Scotland, 1029; by Scotland, 1047; and by Ireland, 999.

Two accidents occurred in the course of the day, one to a marker from a leaden splash, which is comparatively trivial; the other, more serious, happened to a member. Cousins by name, of one of the Lincolnshire corps. Believing that he was merely snapping off a cap, he pointed his rifle downward, in the direction of his foot, and pulled the trigger. The rifle, however, proved to be loaded, and the result was so severely injured by the discharge as to necessitate the amputation of the great toe.

THIRD DAY.

Wednesday opened with every prospect of brilliant fine weather, and at the sevelble at six o'clock the volunteers were aroused from their slumbers by the sounds of the band of the Victoria Regiment. Soon afterwards the whole camp was astir and all was bustle and activity.

The business of the day on the programme consisted in the first instance of the commencement of the first stage of the Queen's prize, to be shot for at 200 yards, and for which there were 2009 competitors.

The shooting began at a quarter past nine o'clock, and the different squads occupied twenty-eight targets. The shooting was carried on with great spirit, and several scores of sixteen were made in the course of the morning.

Another prize of importance begun was the first stage of the Alexandra prize, or rather prize, as they are nearly in number, and are of the total value of £500. The ranges were five shots each, at 200 and 500 yards, the competitors at the 200 yards to shoot from the shoulder.

The third competition was for the Duke of Cambridge's prize, open to all comers, to be shot for by breech-loaders, at 600 yards, seven shots each, for a first prize of £50 ; second, a breech-loader, value £15 ; and a third prize of £12. For the second time £250 is offered in four prizes, for rifles provided with telescopes, at 1000 yards.

The ranges were seven or eight other items of less importance in the programme.

The shooting for the different prizes this day call for no special remark beyond the fact that, the telescopes of Mr. Edward Ross and Colin Ross, of the London Scottish, maintained their former superiority by winning two of the prizes, £20 and £10, and the other £10. Captain Edward Kenyon, of the Edinburgh Rifle Brigade, and Colonel Rose, each made fifty-one points ; but there being a superiority in the last two shots of Mr. Edward Ross, he gained the first prize, Captain Kenyon taking the second of £15.

ever they meet a procession higher in rank than their own. Everybody wishes everybody else happiness on this day. The good old Chinese custom of paying all the debts contracted during the year on or before New-Year's Eve is in full force here; and the man who has not wiped out his score by this time is disgraced, from which custom I think we might take a profitable lesson. During the first month of the year each class of the people, in turn, has one day's holiday—for instance, the hairdressers' holiday, the fire brigades' holiday, and so on. It must be confessed, however, that many men and more women get pleasingly intoxicated under these circumstances, and they insist on making everybody else like them if their persuasive hospitalities are accepted."

REVIEW OF THE VOLUNTEERS AT WIMBLEDON CAMP BEFORE THE PRINCE OF WALES AND SUITE.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOHN ERNEST.

ENCAMPMENT AND REVIEW OF THE SUFFOLK VOLUNTEERS AT LOWESTOFT.

IT is the practice of the volunteer corps of Norfolk and Suffolk to camp out during a certain number of days in the summer, when battalion drill and rifle practice are unceremoniously pursued, and when the necessary camp equipments, such as mess and ordnance tents, are always supplied, free of charge or carriage, by the Government. Several of the best volunteer corps in Suffolk have this year enjoyed a pleasant little campaign at Lowestoft. There was the 5th Suffolk, under Sir John Margetson; the 7th, under Captain Bence; the 9th, under Major Hollond; the 11th, under Captain Crowfoot; and the 13th, under Captain Garrett; the strongest of them all, under Captain Leathes (or Lowestoft), the strongest of them all, under Captain Leathes (or Lowestoft), the strongest of them all, under Captain Leathes (or Lowestoft),

CURRENT LITERATURE.

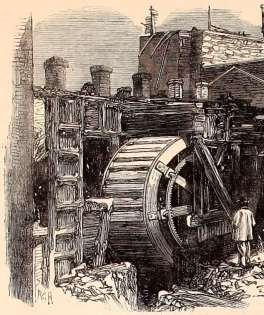
Adventures among the Dyaks of Borneo. By Frederick Boyle, F.R.G.S. (Hurst and Blackett.) A notable book, both for subject and for style. What is told is of itself interesting, and is told with manly, candid, graphic, piquant, unwearying manner. If one cannot see with one's own eyes it is much to read the adventures of those who have seen "that strangest anomaly of the age—a kingdom ruled by a private English gentleman, whose independent sovereignty is recognised by the Queen of England, and the adventures here recorded are of all kinds, from the tragic to the comic. The Dyaks of Borneo are divided into five classes, according to their love of the sea. The former, inhabiting the interior of Sarawak proper, are poor, laborious, and unwarlike; the latter, occupying the coast and the banks of the larger rivers, until the last few years, "spent their whole time in forays by land or sea, collecting plunder and human heads." With respect to a certain tendency said to be inherent in the whole human race, it is said:—"The existence of a people absolutely devoid of such a failing is an every-day matter, and has been frequently denied; but I believe that the Dyaks, who are far from being low-grade, in the scale of humanity, are entirely free from that this sublime and consoling doctrine." How it fared with travellers among this singular people may be pleasantly ascertained from Mr. Boyle's book. At page 18, sq., some facts are related which throw light upon the origin of coral sing expression "to run amuck." It is written, "Perhaps the most striking characteristic of the Malay nature is the strange madness called amuck. The madman does not necessarily avenge himself upon his injurer. . . . He snatches up the first weapon that meets his eye, and dashes to the nearest crowded street, where he runs a tilt right and left, every living thing until shot down like a mad animal." An "instance occurred some years ago of a sailor who 'ran' amuck in the streets of Labuan, and forced all the crew to jump overboard for their lives."

Science and Life. By John Tyndall, D.C.L., LL.D. (Longman and Co.) The tasteful exterior of this little book answers fitly to its graceful subject. It is almost impossible to read Dr. Tyndall's writings on anything which is not worthy of being read for beauty of idea and language, if not for worldly wisdom and practical advice. The title is a little, yet not much, obscure; and it is explained in the first of the lectures (delivered, at Manchester, in 1864) which, with equal ambiguity, are entitled respectively, "Of Force," "Presented by Mr. Peter Spence, Gardens." But, when it is remembered that seesame is the enchanted Arabian phrase which opens doors, and that "Gardens" is the fully among the thorns, as to say love among the daughters" and when it is remembered that, in Mr. Ruskin's words, "Life is not in the treasuries, and women are not only lilies, but queens of the hearts of men," the title, if not the book, will be found to have no cause to quaint but pretty title, he has hidden his purpose of reading to all who will listen a lesson upon the education of boys and girls, of men and women, and, in many, then, a most important and interesting draw near and listen, and whilst they smile, perhaps, at what they consider quaint, wild, unpractical, and visionary, they will be taught to and it is much—that is true, and good, and beautiful.

Immortal Life of the Human Soul. By James Kerr, M.D. (W. H. Allen and Co.) With respect to this very interesting book we are informed, "It happened that professional engagements called the writer of these pages into close intimacy with a large number of intelligent natives" and he had, therefore, abundant opportunity of forming an opinion about what he has to say on the subject of his volume. He gives a favourable idea, upon the whole, of native ability and native industry. He does not think that any connection with the fervour one might have expected, but, by quoting from authorities, the pros and cons of the question, sometimes adding his own testimony one way or the other, he gives by no means a favourable view of the future prospects of the Christian religion in India. Whether Christianity be likely to make much way seems to be problematical. It would probably require a new generation of the natives saw it practised more vigorously by Europeans, so that Brahmin, Mussulman, Vaisya, and Soodra should all alike be struck with the purity of life, the justice, the honesty, and the truthfulness of the governing class so far as to exclaim with amazement, "How these Christians love one another—and their own wives!" Mr. Kerr says, "It has been said, is no vehement partisan; he contents himself with feeling his readers to believe that he has fairly stated the case, and has unscrupulously misused; that he is not such a liar, such a fool, such an ingrate, such is just the answer whereby we may suppose that the Lord would lay the flattering unction to its soul that it was still in some respects superior to its conquerer; to feel and to show your superior you feel that the Lord has given you dominion, and that you cannot cut to its presence without pollution, in a sort of triumph over him. Entertaining such sentiments, you will not exterminate caste; but, until some plan can be hit upon for changing, by philosophy or Christianity, the native mind, as has been hinted, it is hardly to be supposed that he will cease to cling, with the obstinacy of which his religious is but the type, to what gives him, in his inmost soul, a sense of superiority, notwithstanding his veneer of servility, to the "unclean Europeans" that walk the earth among conceives? Doesn't the man of ancient lineage and landed estates refuse to be called at most with a Christian name by the first chance he do) the banker who is also a leadership? Will Jeames "become black to do the work of Buttons"? Would the lady's maid, if she were told, "wash up Mary's dishes" or "clean master's doorsteps"? Would she not rather leave that "instant minute" without two words? Go to! let us talk of what we know human we complain that our neighbour (though he be not "a dog" black fellow") will not readily permit us to govern him.

The North-West Passage by Land. By Viscount Milton, F.R.G.S., F.G.S., &c., and W. B. Cheadle, M.A., M.D., F.R.C.S. (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin.) It is commonly reported and believed that an intelligent examination is required of a candidate for the degrees of the F.G.S. degrees: they are not to be obtained without much in the same way in which you obtain a pair of boots, except that no trouble is needed. Still they add much to the value of a gentleman's name; and if Viscount Milton had put in front of them initials indicative of a University degree, he would have left no question as to the connection between the covers of this volume by an astounding mass of learning and science. But, in point of fact, however, it is a very pleasant, unpedantic, and valuable reading fills the three hundred and ninety odd pages. Anxious by sea and by land to "get through" as well as other sport; descriptions of persons, places, and things; anecdotes and accidents, make an agreeable book. Its authors are free from assertments (to borrow an expression from the lineendagery of excellent illustrations. The travellers left England to undertake the view of exploring a route across the continent to British Columbia, through the Rocky Mountains." The objects in view appeared to have been accomplished, and the travellers, after many an arduous journey "amongst the prairies, forests, and mountains of the Far West," have the satisfaction of pointing out (to the benefit, it is to be hoped, of the commercial world) that, within the famous North-West Passage, "a line has been discovered only to be useless," the original idea of the French Canadians was the right one, and that the true line of route is to be found by way along the fertile belt of the Saskatchewan, leading through British Columbia to the long-neglected harbour of Esquimalt on the glorious fields of Vancouver Island, which offer every advantage for the protection and supply of a merchant fleet trading thence to India, China, and Japan.

Sisters and its System. By Richard A. Proctor, B.A. (Longmans.) Whether "the law of development under which the solar system has reached its present condition" be or be not a puzzle to which the key will some day be found "in the variations perceptibly proceeding in the Saturnian ring-system," may not be "altogether impossible," but is by no means certain. One thing, however, is certain, and that is that Mr. Proctor has published a book which deserves to win the attention of all to whom Saturn, the most interesting of planets to possessors of telescopes, its globe, its rings, its volume and density, the eclipses of its surface by the rings, its atmosphere, its probable or improbable habitability, and its irregularities, are a subject either of curiosity or contemplation. The illustrations are a marvel of vivid engravings in steel and copper.



Popular Inventions of the West of England. Collected and Revised by Robert Hunt, F.R.S. (John Camden Hotten.) Mr. Hunt has collected under this title, in two volumes, a first and second series of "the droils, traditions, and superstitions of old Cornwall," being a number of old wives' tales about giants, fairies, witches, dreams, saints, lost cities, holy wells, and the like. There are, no doubt, many to whom the collection will be very useful, only for purposes of comparison with similar legends of other counties. Mr. Archibald's masterpiece to the first series is a remarkable performance; it shows by means of a magnifying glass the figure of a man who could stride six miles would cut in the eyes of an average spectator. Of course it may be said that either the spectator might be placed so to see the more imposing parts of the giant to advantage or perspective may be narrowed to produce the effect, the story of a man the Colossus with an awe-inspiring air; but such was evidently not Mr. Cornish's intention.

Shakespeare. Edited by the Rev. A. Dyce. (Chapman and Hall.) Mr. Dyce's noble edition is drawing near its conclusion. It is to consist of eight volumes, of which it is pleasant to announce that the first six are now completed. The sixth contains "Troilus and Cressida," "Coriolanus," "Titus Andronicus," "Romeo and Juliet," "Timon of Athens," and "Julius Cæsar."

Mark! yet it speaks to be. By Robert Baker and Skelton Yorke. (Smith, Elder, and Co.) A story in two volumes, showing how a poor cabin-passenger, by energy, earnestness, patience, piety, and worth obtained even in this world what is worth having, and, finally, how a miserable husband was reconciled to a loving but indiscreet and misjudged wife. Some of the characters are sketched in the story fairly, but there is little originality of conception, and there is a sickening amount of false religion. The book, however, is decidedly readable.

MUSIC.

The revival of Mozart's "Zauberflöte," in an Italian dress and under its Italian title of "Il Flauto Magico," at Her Majesty's Theatre, has created a great increase in our musical world. It was announced for Saturday, but was postponed to the following week, Saturday. On both nights the theatre was crowded to overflowing, and the audience showed their enthusiasm in the course of this celebrated opera. The music of the "Zauberflöte" is of incomparable beauty and variety, and it is not to be wondered at that it has always been a household word in every country in Europe. When first it was heard in London, on its production at the Lyceum by all classes that it was said that Mozart had enchanted all Germany with his enchanted flute, and that country its magic has been almost equally strong. The charm of Mozart's music is felt by all by people of all ranks and degrees; by the learned connoisseur, the accomplished lady, the man of science, and the simple peasant; the tunes of English popular ditties to many among us, who know nothing of the name of Mozart, which they have learned to love and delighted with "The Manly Heart," or "Away with Melancholy," have never heard of the composer who has immortalised them. The general captivation lies in their simplicity, grace, expression, and unfading freshness. They are familiar, melodious, and yet original, and nothing by them can ever be effaced. But, with all the beauty of its music, the "Zauberflöte" is a work which has never taken possession of the stage. In Italy, France, and England, it has never been a favourite too to time, performed a few nights, and then laid aside, without having ever obtained a firm hold on the public favour, and the plot can be, on the stage, and have contented themselves with enjoying its music in their way—a concert performance, which they have found to be a very obvious one, a cause which has been fatal to the success of many beautiful operas which have been produced in modern times, and is united. The subject seems to be a sort of allegory, of that fantastic and mystical nature which is in some measure peculiar to the German mind, but to English judgment and taste is merely unintelligible and absurd. It is not worth while to give an analysis of it, it is something to this purpose:—The scene is laid in Egypt. Sarastro is the high priest of the country, the world is governed by two opposing principles or powers—that of Night and that of Light, which are embodied in a personage called the Queen of Night; the principle of Light in the High Priest Sarastro, which typifies the ancient religion number of their pupils and enlarged the curriculum of their education, and were in consequence still more liberally supported by the grand lodge and the craft in general. Thus, then, the institution, when once made known, went on flourishing, until at last the Manor House became too small for its requirements. The trustees and governors therefore, determined to build a new school-house, from the designs of Brother Stephen Barton Wilson, fitted up with all the modern requirements of such an establishment—class-rooms, dormitories, lavatories, &c.—and capable of accommodating from 150 to 200 boys and the necessary staff of officers. They accordingly purchased a site immediately adjoining their old tenement, and about two years ago the Earl of Zetland, grand master of the order, laid the corner-stone of the structure, with full masonic honours. Since then the work has gone on with great spirit; and the building being now completed, the brethren on Saturday met in special grand lodge, and a procession, headed by the stewards carrying their wands of office, having been formed under the direction of the G.D.C., the brethren walked in regular order from the place where they had assembled to the new building. The grand master, attended by his grand wardens, chaplains, registrar, &c., entered the edifice, and having invoked upon the undertaking the continual blessing of the G.A.O.T.U., declared it opened for the purposes of the charity, the new organ, erected by Messrs. Gray and Davison, pealing forth solemn music. As a sum of £10,000 is still required to defray the expenses of the building, some of the wives, daughters, and sons of members of the order, who had undertaken to make a collection towards the accumulation of that amount, deposited in the hands of the treasurer a pile of purses containing the result of their labours. This was followed by a déjeuner à la fourchette and a great variety of outdoor amusements.

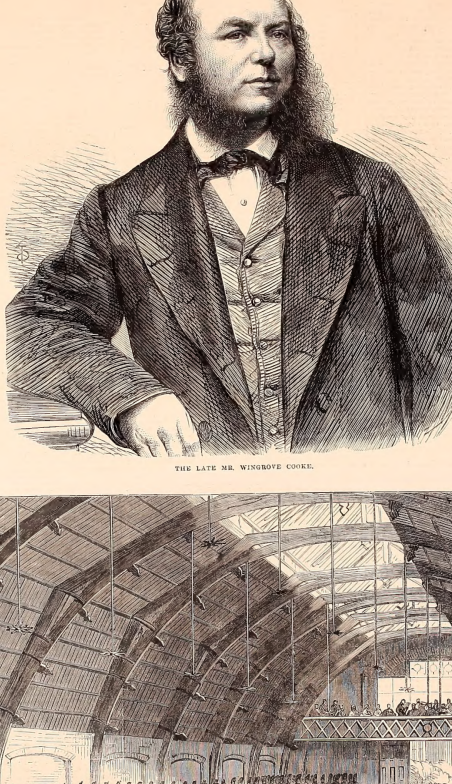
CENTENARY FESTIVAL OF NELSON'S SHIP, THE VICTORY.

THE Victory, Nelson's flagship in the Battle of Trafalgar, hallowed by the memory of his death, is still extant, as a hulk, in Portsmouth Harbour; while her model, in the Naval Gallery of the South Kensington Museum, formed the subject of one of our illustrations in the Number of this Journal for March 11. On Wednesday week the centenary festival of this famous ship, which was launched at Chatham, in July, 1765, was celebrated by her present commander, Captain Francis Scott, C.B., with a ball, which he gave, on the upper deck, to a party of some four hundred guests, including Admiral Sir Michael Seymour, with Lady Seymour, and the chiefs of the various departments in the dockyard, with their families, besides many of the naval officers and of the neighbouring gentry. The upper deck, as shown in our illustration, was covered in with a sort of awning and tastefully decorated with the flags of all nations, and with festoons of evergreens around the masts, while some pots of beautiful flowers were ranged on the poop. The ship had been brought alongside the dockyard for the convenience of access. The dancing commenced at three o'clock in the afternoon and ended at seven in the evening. The company were therefore in morning costume; and some of the ladies wore their bonnets or hats all the time. The naval officers appeared in their blue frock-coats, with laced sleeves, or a scarf to denote their rank; and the military gentlemen were in their undress frock-coats or braided shell-jackets. Refreshments of the choicest description were provided upon the main deck, where the table was handsomely laid. Three wine-glasses used by Nelson himself were among the furniture of this repast, and many of the guests were permitted to drink from them to the immortal memory of the great English naval hero. The whole entertainment passed off with entire success.

RUINS OF THE CARBINE FACTORY AND RAILWAY STATION AT RICHMOND.

THE scenes of havoc and ruin in the city of Richmond after the great conflagration which ensued upon the retirement of the Confederate army and Government, in the first week of April, have already been made the subjects of some of our illustrations. We present in this Number a view of the ruins of the building which had been occupied as a carbine factory by the military department of the Administration, Richmond being a place where large quantities of arms and ammunition were manufactured during the war. Our second Engraving gives a view of the ruins of the buildings of the Richmond and Petersburg Railway, which here crosses the James River by a bridge already described. Some further illustrations of this subject, as well as of the flight of the Confederate President into Georgia, will be published on a future occasion.



DEDICATION OF THE MONUMENT ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF BULL RUN, VIRGINIA.

THE MONUMENTS ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF BULL RUN.

TWO battles—that of July 21, 1861, and that of Aug. 29, 1862—were fought between the Confederates and Federals in the plain traversed by the small river called Bull Run, which crosses the main road from Washington to Richmond, a few miles north of Manassas Gap. The scene of the first conflict, one of the earliest of the war in Virginia, would now scarcely be recognised as a battle-field. Four years have obliterated nearly all the marks of the struggle, and the relic-hunter only now and then finds in the grass a memento of the event. Very few shot and shell remain upon the surface; the trees are hiding the blotches on their trunks made by bullets, and the only bones that are found, with few exceptions, are those of horses, which visitors have not thought of sufficient importance to be carried away. Some of the fences have been rebuilt, and corn is planted in many places; while the rapidly-growing bushes hide nearly all the original features of the field. The battle-field of Groveton, two miles beyond, towards Warrenton, is more distinctly marked with traces of battle. Here the shot and shell are thickly strewn, the trees are splintered, and in many places the forest looks as if it had been visited by small-pox. The bones of the soldiers of both armies are scattered over the fields, and the phrenologist may find skulls enough. A monument has now been erected on each of the Bull Run battle-fields. These monuments are of chocolate-coloured sandstone, thirty feet high, and were erected by the officers and men of General Gamble's separate cavalry brigade, camped at Fairfax Courthouse. The monument on the first Bull Run field is situated on the hill in front of the memorable stone house, on the spot where the 16th Brooklyn, 1st Michigan, and 1st and 2nd Maine were most hotly engaged, and where Ricketts and Griffin lost their batteries. The shaft is 27 ft. high, and bears upon its top a hundred-pound shell. On the pedestal, at each corner, is a shell of similar size. On one side of the shaft is inscribed, "To the memory of the patriots who fell at Bull Run, July 21st, 1861," and on the reverse, "Erected June 10th, 1865." The monument at Groveton is similar in its proportions, bearing its inscription, "To the memory of the patriots who fell at Groveton, August 29, 1862," and on the reverse, "Erected June 10th, 1865." Our illustration represents the scene at the consecration, or "dedication," as it is called in America, of these monuments. The religious exercises were conducted on the first Bull Run field by the Rev. Dr. M'Murdy, who read an appropriate service, which was followed by a hymn written for the occasion by Pierpont; a military parade by the 5th Pennsylvania heavy artillery, Colonel Gallup; and a salute by the 16th Massachusetts battery, Captain Scott. At the close of these ceremonies, eloquent addresses were delivered by Judge Olin, General Wilcox, General Heintzelman, and General Farnsworth. At the second monument the services were similar to those described. A large party of visitors had come from Washington to be present on this occasion.

THE LATE MR. GEORGE WINGROVE COOKE.

A BRIEF memoir of this gentleman appeared in our Journal a few weeks back, on the occasion of his sudden death, which took place, at his residence in Chelsea, on the 18th ult. We have engraved his portrait from a photograph by Messrs. Maull and Polyblank. Mr. Wingrove Cooke was a barrister and special pleader of the Inner Temple, and was perhaps better known to the public as having been the Times special correspondent in China. He was also the author of an able work, entitled "The History of Party," giving an account of the Whig Ministry under Earl Grey and Lord Melbourne, and of the legislation which accompanied the Reform Bill. In 1859 Mr. Cooke was an unsuccessful candidate for the representation of Marylebone. As a writer on legal subjects he had gained much reputation by his treatises on the law of tithes and on copyhold tenures; so that, upon the death of Mr. Mulcs, a few years back, he was appointed a Commissioner of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithes Commission; and this appointment, which was made with the general approval of the legal profession, Mr. Wingrove Cooke continued to hold until the day of his death. His narrative of the war in China has considerable literary merit.

THE LATE MR. WINGROVE COOKE.

THE NEW HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE 1ST SURREY RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

OUR Illustration shows the interior of the drill-shed erected at the new head-quarters of the 1st Surrey Rifle Volunteers, with the company assembled there on Saturday week, when the place was formally opened by the Earl of Lovelace, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Surrey, under most favourable circumstances. The new head-quarters are situated in Brunswick-road, Camberwell, where the corps have succeeded in locating themselves very advantageously. A piece of ground, consisting of nearly four acres, has been secured to them, and on it they have erected a building which, when fully completed, cannot fail to meet all the requirements of the corps. The new building has been erected, at a cost of £5000, from designs by Mr. Lepard, of John-street, Adelphi, who is an ensign in the corps, and who has acted as honorary architect. It is replete with comfort and convenience. The drill-shed is 150 ft. by 52 ft., with a spacious gallery at one end for visitors. There is a fine room for the assemblage of the men, with a bar fitted up as a canteen, a spacious armoury, dressing-rooms, lavatories, stores for keeping uniforms and private clothing, apartments for Sergeant-Major and family, officers' and non-commissioned officers' rooms, and indeed every accommodation; and arrangements are made for ultimately erecting a spacious concert-room. The drill-shed was well filled, on the evening named, by a fashionable company. Around the shed the 1st Surrey were formed up in single file, and near the gallery were stationed a guard of honour of the Hon. Artillery Company, with their excellent band, under command of Major Robinson. The Earl of Lovelace and a distinguished company occupied seats in the gallery. Amongst those supporting the noble Earl were Major-General Sir G. Pollock and Lady Pollock; Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonald, the Commandant of the 1st Surrey; Colonel M'Murdo, who had laid the foundation-stone of the building; Major Irvine and other officers of the 1st Surrey; Lieutenant-Colonel Lahcee, 19th Surrey; Lieut.-Colonel Durnford, Surrey Volunteer Artillery; Col. Hughes, 19th Middlesex; Sir C. De Crespigny, Bart., Lieutenant-Colonel 1st Essex Administrative Battalion; Mr. F. Doulson, M.P. for Lambeth; the Rev. Daniel Moore, chaplain; and Captain Dresser Rogers. After the opening ceremony, which was of an imposing character, the company went into the parade-ground, which, as has been said, consists of nearly four acres, where the corps were inspected by General Sir George Pollock, G.C.B., K.S.I., the honorary colonel of the regiment. After the inspection the corps were complimented by General Pollock on the general excellence of their drill. To Lieutenant Herbert Pocock, honorary secretary, and Lieutenant and Quartermaster Harrison Weir, who were intrusted with the general arrangements, is due much of the credit of the satisfactory manner in which the whole proceedings passed off.

FINE ARTS.

ART IN PHOTOGRAPHY.

THERE is now on view, at Messrs. Colnaghi and Co.'s, Pall-mall, a series of photographs, in course of publication by that firm, which may fairly be considered to have completely reversed the estimate of the capabilities of photography hitherto formed by artists and persons of artistic sensibility and cultivation. Instead of regarding photography as entirely out of the domain of fine art, we now find some of the first artists in England testifying that in certain branches several of the noblest qualities a painter can aspire to realise. The remark has often been made that the earliest essays in photography occasionally rendered broad and beautiful effects of light and shade, and conveyed suggestions of life and motion, which have gradually disappeared as the operations of chemical means and appliances of the photographer have been perfected. The aims of the whole world of photographers appear to have been to produce a preternatural and deadlike "sharpness" of definition and the utmost quantity of microscopic detail. Most valuable qualities these unquestionably are if we wish to secure an exact facsimile or record of a scene or object in all its minutiæ; but they convey a really different impression from that which the mind receives by the eye, and an impression removed almost as far as possible from that which the artist should seek to convey to the mind. Art photography is in any sense to compete with art it must, as we have always strenuously maintained, adopt other principles. It is not surprising that an artist—Mr. Wyndham—should have been the first to act upon a conviction of this necessity. The first photographer to "follow Nature," Cameron—to fully demonstrate the marvellously various and noble results which follow the application of the principles of fine art to the practice of photography. Commencing the study of photography, as we are informed, only about eighteen months ago, as a retired part of the life of Wight; provided with a very ordinary apparatus; lacking many of the usual facilities; and, fortunately, as we are disposed to say, without any love of the usual processes, Mrs. Cameron has succeeded in entirely opening a field for photography that had remained almost a terra incognita. We shall have to congratulate photographers that the productions of Mrs. Cameron, at Colnaghi's, are "out of focus," or "under-exposed" (as they would say), or "fuzzy at the lens," and that they have any defects of manipulation. We are persuaded that several of these photographers would rejoice if the lady's reputation and retard the reception of her principles. Nevertheless, it appears to us equally important that the public generally afford a pleasure differing not only in degree, but wholly in kind, from that to be derived from ordinary photographs. We find them startled into serious attention which is not of strange delight at all an unexpected discovery in nature. Anything more anti-pre-Raphaelite it is impossible to conceive. Photography is made most opportunely to strengthen the reaction from that schism by giving a scientific demonstration of the impossibility of the truth of the principles of the old masters. It is the simple fact, incredible as it may appear, that the photographs of Cameron recognise the sources in nature of Michael Angelo's awful grandeur of imagination, of Raphael's ideal and serene idealism; the melting sweetness of the Madonnas of Leonardo and the charming of Correggio; the mystery of Rembrandt's shadows and Velasquez; the grace and loveliness in women and children of Raphael; the refinement of Reynolds and Gainsborough; the dignity and repose of Titian; and the vigour and truth of Rubens and Vandyke. They may almost be reduced to prove, in opposition to the theory of the schools, that the Real and the Ideal are not to be sought for, as is only by dramatic invention, by colour, and by the evidences of mental operations in his handiwork. But the artist's hope to maintain his proper supremacy. It is almost invidious to make a selection from upwards of one hundred photographs, all of which are remarkable, most necessarily be very limited within our space; but we may call special attention to the following subjects:—"Sappho," a three or four of Henry Taylor, the poet author of "Philip van Artevelde," giving different views of a remarkably fine head; a grand profile of G. F. Watts, the painter; Sir Colin Campbell, in the dress of an antique bronze; and Lady Elcho, as a "Dantesque Vision" and the "Countess Sybil," besides others, including portraits of Sir John Herschel, Robert Browning, Holman Hunt, J. Spedding, and Lady Adelaide Talbot, another fair "Madonna-like" beauty. The artist has given the name for particular commendation "Light and Love," "La Madonna Aspettante," "La Madonna Addolorata," "La Madonna Ispirata," "The Shunamite Woman," "O Ruth," "Double Star," "The Recording Angel," "Annie Infant Immanuel," "Grace Darling," "Light through Love," "La Madonna Riposata," "Blessing and Blessed," "La Madonna Ricordata," "Light or Love," "Light in Light," "Light, and "Sadness." It must be confessed that some of Mrs. Cameron's titles are rather too ambitious and far-fetched; yet their imaginativeness is often an additional recommendation. The explanation of her success involves the divulgence of no secret. She determinedly avoids all hardening of outline, all minute detail, and all pettiness of effect; she works with a moderate-sized lens often in the open air, and dispenses with a studied background. She has her subjects at perfect ease, and she endeavours to bring herself into mental sympathy with them in order to realise the expression she requires; and to the selection of models for her fancy pieces and the best point of view, the posing and arrangement of figures and groups, the disposition of the draperies, and the management of the light and shade, she brings a singularly quick and highly-educated artistic perception.

The Art Exhibition in aid of the funds for completing the erection of the Wedgwood Institute, was opened on Monday, at Alton Towers, the magnificent and extensive seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury. The use of which has been liberally permitted by his Lordship during the two months the exhibition will remain open. The collection is large, varied, and of very considerable excellence. It contains large collections of paintings by ancient and modern masters, and numerous and other drawings, including those by local artists, or works illustrative of Wedgwood and his connection with Flaxman; together with architectural drawings; engravings; models; specimens of the topography of the midland counties; photographs, sculptures, carvings, fictile and decorative arts; and a considerable collection of virtù; pottery, especially old Wedgwood ware; and modern examples of the art-manufactures of the midland counties. One most interesting feature of the display in a collection of old Wedgwood ware illustrating the progress of the manufacture in its various stages. All the chief collectors of this most beautiful description of modern pottery are contributors. The show of specimens of this ware is in great variety. Mr. Gladstone contributes the dejeuner service in this ware of which he spoke at Burslem. There are also several cases of specimens in imitation of the antique. The most comprehensive descriptions and applications of Wedgwood ware—together showing that there are hardly any limits to the variety of combinations in which it is available. The authorities of the South Kensington Museum contribute largely to the exhibition.

Of the great cycle of mural paintings illustrative of the history of France from the earliest ages which Mr. Ary Scheffer was engaged in decorating the principal court of the Invalides at Paris, one fourth part, occupying one of the walls, is now finished. It is 100 feet in length, 180 ft. in length, and the painting contains 1200 figures, the foremost of which are larger than life. The subject is "Charlemagne Receiving Tributes." Druidical priests and priestesses surround an oak, sacrificing, and the minister of the sacred rites of Thor, while a Frank under Clovis are crossing the Rhine to offer battle to the Roman General Syragrius; then Christianity dawns on France: Queen Clotilde leads the conversion of Charlemagne to the baptismal font, and causes him to be crowned at Rheims by St. Remy. The crimes caused by the rivalry of the four brothers who succeeded Clovis are set forth in incidents connected with Brunehaut and Frodegonde; the Saracens appear; the Battle of Poitiers is won; Charles Martel slays Abderam, and the crescent disappears before the cross. A new era begins under Charlemagne, whose long and glorious reign is variously illustrated. Following in chronological order, the Lombards succeed the Saracens in the invasion of France. Paris is threatened by the Norman Rollo, and is valiantly defended by Eudes; lastly, the feudal system is introduced, and is represented by the artist in its real character: sanguinary struggles between lord and vassals, scenes of violence, pillage, and a truce are depicted with great force.

The Queen has conferred on Lieut. Hay, of the Royal Naval Reserve, lately commanded to the First Lord of the Admiralty (the Duke of Somerset), on Tuesday afternoon, the Victoria Cross, for having, during the same action, performed a most daring act of gallantry. During the same engagement, a number of fireworks in the fort exploded immediately after the Russian flag had been struck, and the Russians, who had retired to the fort, fourteen years of age, was mortally wounded. Three other boys were slightly injured. The Queen has conferred the Victoria Cross upon each of these boys.

On Monday the Duke of Cambridge inspected the Cavalry Depôt and Riding Establishment at Canterbury, on the occasion of which His Royal Highness was received by the troops in complete marching order, under the command of Colonel Lord Arthur Hay, C.B., and Major Hall. Having marched past, the troops performed a variety of manœuvres and movements, under the direction of Major Lord Arthur Somerset, and His Royal Highness for their steadiness of drill. The hospital was next visited, and minute inquiries made into the condition of the sick and the state of the approval. Preceding thence to the Riding-school his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge was received by Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton, the Assistant Major Brenkhurn, superintendent of the Riding-school. The whole of the Cavalry Establishment, consisting of 300 horses, were then brought in, and undergoing a minute inspection, marched past in slow and quick time. An officers' riding class was then put through the various military exercises. His Royal Highness expressing himself to the commanding officer as highly pleased with the whole of the proceedings.

The following is a list of ships belonging to the Royal Navy now under the command of officers serving in the various naval establishments at the latest advices received:—The Canopus, 17, screw-sloop, Commander Hon. OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LADY REAY.

The Right Hon. Marian Dawson Reay, of Reay, in the county of Caithness, who died on the 2nd inst., at Plymouth, was the last surviving child of Colonel Gall, military secretary to Warren Hastings while Governor-General of India. Her Ladyship was married, first, to David Rose, Esq., of Calcutta, eldest son of Uvedale Rose, Lord Aukerville, of Aukerville, Rose-shire, a Lord of Session in Scotland; and secondly, April 8, 1830, to Sir Alexander Mackay, eighth Baron Reay, who succeeded to the peerage upon the death of his brother, the seventh Baron Reay, the latter having died, unmarried, at Gedding, England, May 27, 1847, in the eighth Baron Reay, who died in 1863. By either husband Lady Reay had two sons and two daughters, of whom our-her union with him Lady Reay had two sons and two daughters—the eldest—wife one son, Eric, born in 1838; Arthur Aylmer, Esq., the Hon. Elizabeth, who, the Hon. Sophia, who died in 1858, and the Hon. Clara, who died in 1860. Her Ladyship was the first Duchess, sister of the late Duke of Montrose. As Lady Reay's eldest surviving son, Eric, present Lord Reay, is unmarried, the heirship presumptive to his old barony of Reay and his hereditary as present heir-male is Lord Reay's brother, the Hon. Arthur Aylmer, Esq., of Orphemert, Vice-President of the Privy Council of the kingdom of the Netherlands.

THE REV. DR. ARNOLD.

The Rev. James William Arnold, D.D., of Rochdale, in the county of Northampton, head and male representative of an ancient branch of the family of Arnold, originally Monmouthshire, was the third and last surviving son of George Arnold, Esq., of Reading, in the county of Berks, by Elizabeth, daughter of George Ill., by his second wife, Henrietta Jane, eldest daughter of General George Morrison, Quartermaster-General. He was born July 29, 1798, and was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. He succeeded his brother, George Henry Arnold, Esq., of Sandy Hollyer, Oct. 27, 1844. He married, July 2, 1822, Lady Mary Howard, third daughter of William, second Earl of Wicklow, and sister of Sir William Howard, K.C., and consequently Earl of Wicklow, by whom, who survives him, he leaves one son, William Howard, of Rochdale, in the city of Northampton, the family of Arnold, Dorsetshire, and afterwards of Ashby St. Ledgers, Northamptonshire, and the Rev. Dr. Arnold represented, is of old standing and historic note. One of his ancestors, Sir John Arnold, was Deputy of Ireland in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and is famous for having been the first importer of the breed of English cattle, and for having thus rendered a benefit to this country, which it still retains. Sir Nicholas himself lived a deal of where there remains, and has inherited the finest breeds from Spain and other countries. Another scion of this house, Richard Arnold, was, in 1719, Deputy Secretary at War, and was succeeded in 1724, Secretary at War for Scotland. The Arnolds of Arnould had, in different generations, many distinguished members among whom was famed soldiers with Marlborough, Wellington, and Moore, and Captain of the Horses of Clifton Manhood, the husband of Colmar, the Goddess of the Heaven of Clifton Manhood, the husband of Alton Parsons; and Mr. Secretary Frome Selwin married Judith, daughter of Sir John Shaw, Bart., of Arnold house, married Elizabeth Arnold.

DR. DANIELL.

William Freeman Daniell, M.D., F.L.S., the African traveller, late Staff Surgeon to her Majesty's Ashantee forces, returned from Africa in bad health to England last September, with a constitution thoroughly broken up by the climate, and the exposure and hardships, and died very soon, and buried at Kingsbridge, Devon. Dr. Daniell was well-known to the scientific world by his indefatigable labours and researches in the study of the animal and vegetable kingdoms of the peculiar coast of Western Africa and other parts of the globe. He served the whole of his time at Addenbrooke's Hospital, Cambridge, and he subsequently had obtained his promotion to the rank of Staff Surgeon March 31, 1863, after that he went to the Gold Coast, where he had already accompanied the expeditionary force. Dr. Daniell was in 1860, when he first returned to England, induced by his friends to make some additions to our knowledge of the natural history of the country, he more especially undertook a fine collection of Tartary oak, which may, at some future day, furnish timber for a dockyard at Hong-Kong. Dr. Daniell was a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, and was also a Fellow of the Geographical, Linnean, and Pharmaceutical Societies, to which he was a contributor of numerous valuable and scientific papers. He was well acquainted with the native languages of many of the African tribes, and had a considerable knowledge of Arabic. He published a pamphlet on the "Medical Topography and Native Diseases of the Gulf of Guinea."

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Hon. and Rev. Paul Anthony Irby, M.A., was proved in the principal registry by the surviving executors, Frederick Irby, Esq., the eldest son; the other executors being the Hon. Augusta Irby, the relict, and Lord William Irby (the second son), the personalty being sworn under £3000. The testator was the fourth son of the second Lord Boston, and was married in 1827 to the eldest daughter of the Rev. Anthony Hamilton Bonnor, by whom he has issue seven sons and two daughters.

The will of the Rev. Joseph Gerard, of Bartobello House, East Sheen, Surrey, relict of Sir John Gerard, Bart., of Garswood Hall, Lancaster, was proved in the London Court on the 16th ult., the executors appointed being Frederick Sevalia Gerard, Esq. (her brother-in-law), of Aspull House, near Wigan; and Thomas Bowring, Esq., of Bengal Club, Calcutta, the personalty of which was sworn under £7000. The will is dated the 8th of July, 1864, and her Majesty is the residuary legatee. The testatrix bequeaths to Frederick Sevalia Gerard, Esq., and to his children, the pictures, &c., at Garswood, and to the person she leaves to her niece Leontine, Countess de la Pasture, whom she supposes resident in Belgium or in her native, Switzerland, and whom she is like bequest to the Rev. J. G. Wenham, of the Roman Catholic church of St. Mary Magdalene, Bermondsey, in which parish she died, the sum of £100; to her maid, Elizabeth Haggerston, she leaves all her wearing apparel, a gold watch, and a life interest in £1000 Three per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities; and £50 to be divided amongst all her other servants.

The will of Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Gordon Gray (Royal Engineers), late of Cork, in Ireland, where he died on January 8 last, was proved in the Dublin Court by his mother, Mrs. Gordon Gray, one of the executrixes, a power being reserved to his elder, Augusta Frances Elizabeth Gray, the grace hereafter. The will is dated the 1st of July, 1864, and appoints are Sir H. C. Kirby, of Harewood-square; and Thomas Page, of Hyde Park-gardens. To the entirety in the Colonel's property, amounting to £1000, is bequeathed to his mother a life interest in the whole of his property, and at her decease the same is to be divided between his brothers and sisters, and in the event of the latter's decease, then for the children of the latter.

The will of Mrs. Arabella Penelope Hoare, of Kelsey Beckenham, Kent, was proved in the London Court by her son, Peter Richard Hoare, Esq., the sole executor, and the personalty sworn under £3000. The will was brought into the registry by Messrs. Hore and Sons, solicitors, Lincoln's-inn-fields. The testatrix has left numerous legacies, including one to her said son, Peter Richard Hoare, for ornamental purposes, and the residue of her property she bequeaths to her daughters such a sum as on sale or purchase thereof will produce £1000 Three per Cent. Consols for her daughters, together with her granddaughter, ecclesiastic legatees. The will is dated June 15, 1864, and is attested by Geo. R. Hoare, Beckenham, and by Bench-walk, and the Rev. Edmund E. Allen, Milton Vicarage, Cumberland.

The Queensland Government has sanctioned a scheme for a limited assisted immigration from Italy. It is proposed that the immigrant introduced shall consist of agriculturists, such as vine and olive growers, and other workmen skilled in the cultivation of the produce of the south of Italy.

The Publicista of Marseilles announces a strike of bachelors. About 6000 young men, it states, of that place, between the age of twenty and thirty, held a meeting and entered into an agreement not to ask any young woman in marriage until a competence should have operated in the interest of living, and particularly in the dress, of the fairer sex. The young men insist on greater simplicity in every respect and a return to the more modest habits of a century or two ago.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CAPT. C. Sherla.—Correspondents to a public paper, especially such as live at a great distance, should write with unmistakable distinctness. The error of "Alferis" for "Alferis" in your solution of the problem published on the 24th ult. is a case in point, which, although much below the standard of those published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, exhibits so much ingenuity and freshness of conception that we shall be glad to receive more from your pen.—Solutions of Problem No. 1114 received from the authors appear to be correct.

No. 1325.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

INTERNATIONAL NAVAL COURTESIES.

ABOUT a month ago, if our memory be not at fault, Lord Clarence Paget, Secretary to the Board of Admiralty, announced to the public, in an informal way, that a squadron of French ironclads would visit the British coasts, that the courtesy would be reciprocated by the appearance of a detachment from the ironclad fleet of her Majesty in French waters, and that, some time during the present month, the two fleets would be in conjunction. The bustle of the general election has, doubtless, diverted public expectation in this country from an event which would otherwise have been looked forward to, as well on account of its significance as its novelty, with eager interest. We presume that it is in pursuance of this friendly project, originally suggested, it is said, by the Emperor of the French, that his two screw ironclads, Magenta and La Flandre, attended by the gun-boats Ariel, are now lying in Plymouth Sound, where they have been joined by the Prince Consort, the Achilles, and the Royal Sovereign turret-ship, and where they will remain during the continuance of the agricultural exhibition. We suppose also that the announcement of the Patrie to the effect that, "upon the invitation of France and England, several Powers will send vessels to be present at the fêtes at Cherbourg and Brest," has reference to the Imperial programme. In short, the ironclads of the maritime nations of Europe are to have their first meeting—not for a trial of their destructive powers upon each other, but for an interchange of courtesies. There will be balls given and received, but they will not be such as we are accustomed to associate in idea with vessels of war. Dancing and festivity will prevail in presence of the engines prepared to scatter death and desolation, and there will be toasts and songs and laughter, betokening mutual and cordial amity, even at the cannon's mouth.

The idea is characteristically French; but it is none the worse for that. The whole arrangement is so obviously and exclusively due to sentiment that no one thoroughly acquainted with the practical and matter-of-fact turn of the English mind could imagine it to have been the product of that soil. But although, as a people, we are not given to dramatise upon the stage of our public affairs, we are not so dull that we cannot apprehend, nor so cold that we cannot reciprocate, overtures of international friendship when they chance to reach us in such a form. The mode of expression is regarded by us as of little importance where the purport of it is intended to gratify. War, we know, will not be abolished by any occasional fraternisation of naval crews; and the fleets which are in conjunction to-day may be hurling thunderbolts at each other to-morrow. Nevertheless, we are not so indifferent as some imagine to the proposed ceremonial of presenting arms on our own especial element, nor in the least averse to a formal and, we hope, a cordial greeting between the fleets of rival Powers. The proposition, having been made to us evidently in good faith, is none the less welcome because somewhat beside the line of our national routine. It may not be our insular habit to trust much to a pre-arranged shaking of hands, but we may very gladly go through that ceremony when an exchange of courteous feeling and neighbourly good-will has been invited. That which is not valued for itself may be highly appreciated for what it is designed to indicate.

The friendly meeting of ironclads, then, whether those of England and France only, or those of all the European naval Powers, will, we have no doubt, be regarded by our countrymen in general with unfeigned satisfaction. It is due to a predominant feeling in favour of peace. Napoleon III. would hardly have suggested it if his humour were unfriendly or his policy based upon the contingency of war. France has lately reaped so rich a harvest from the partial relaxation of her old restraints upon commerce and has made such rapid strides towards wealth under the treaties she has entered into; the enterprise of her manufacturers has been so largely and successfully evoked, and her prospect in the event of the continuance of peace is so cheering, that there is no room to doubt the sincerity of her wishes to cultivate the most intimate political relations with the country. Of the Emperor's desire to promote the utmost harmony between the two Governments he has given repeated proofs on the most striking and we are therefore not merely entitled but reasonably bound to accept his proposition respecting the ironclad fleets as a frank and unreserved expression of good-will. The cruising together of the two squadrons, should that part of the plan be carried into effect, will aptly typify the union of the two greatest maritime Powers of Europe for the preservation of peace. The mingling together in festive enjoyment of the officers of both fleets will go far to divest national prejudices of their remaining relics of all rancour and to substitute emulation for jealousy. The moral effect of the exhibition upon the world will be highly tranquilising, and Continental opinion will probably see in it a public guarantee that, so far as England and France are concerned, no interruption of international quiet need be apprehended.

It would be curious, and is not so utterly improbable as at first sight it appears, if this, the first use to which the ironclads of England and France are to be put, should prove to be the only one for which they are destined. Floating engines of war of such stupendous power, so instructed in such diabolical arts, and at such vast expense, do not strike one as the most suitable means for the exchange of friendly compliments between two great nations. And yet if, after the visit of the Imperial squadron to Plymouth Sound, the Emperor and Empress shall join in Cherbourg Harbour on the Emperor's fete-day, and the visitation by the combined fleets of English and French ports in succession, these ships should therefore have nothing to do but to obey harmlessly the impulse of the wind and the current of the deep, no soul on earth would have cause for dissatisfaction. The force which in case of need they can express was never meant to be employed but to ward off assault and compel a peace; and if both ends can be gained by showing the sword the better for humanity. Is it not possible that they have already answered their purpose? May it not be that the competitive preparation and completion of such terrible instruments of destruction, and a foretaste of the work for which they would ensue from their hostile collision, have illustrated so vividly the folly of settling international differences by an appeal to these grim and ruthless arbiters as to quicken the desire of establishing a lasting peace by some less cruel and costly method? Should the fact be so, neither we nor our neighbours across the Channel would have reason to complain of the outlay to which we have been put to provide for the construction of these vessels. They will have done our work, only in a much gentler and more effective manner than we had anticipated. They will have turned out to be a cheap defence: and, like some of our old castles—now mouldering away, or sold, put an end, once for all, to raids and freebooting in their surrounding districts—they will be regarded by those who come after us as an instructive exemplification of the moral effect which is occasionally produced by a reasonable display of concentrated and irresistible physical force.

Of course this is nothing better than speculation, pleasant enough, but unsubstantial—a something that may be, but has no other present existence than in our own fancies. Nor are our own dreams are made of"—and not by any means to be confounded with the actual and real. Our plea is, the facts are of a nature so uncommon that they spur speculation into activity, and we have rested it in rather than incited it. For the peaceful greeting which French and English ironclads are giving to each other under high auspices, singularly enough, has been coincident with the prevalence of rumours, authoritatively declared to be unfounded, that the project of a European Congress has been revived, and that a general reduction of armaments will be one of its main objects. We are bound to accept the declaration of the Paris Constitutionnel that the "the Imperial Government leaves to time the task of still more completely justifying the counsels of the Emperor." "The reports current" on the subject, whatever their ultimate source, have been reported in Paris, and indicate, at all events, the direction in which public expectation is imagined to look. That they are premature we do not doubt: that they will not conjecture we think to be far from certain. Possibly, we shall hear something more of them when the complaint mission of the ironclads shall have been brought to a close. There is reason to believe that the Emperor's suggestion in regard to the fleets was made to pave the way toward something beyond itself, having reference to the future consolidation of peace. If so, we trust he will so far succeed as to secure the end in view, even if we are not quite sure of the wisdom he displays in his choice of means.

The young widowed Queen of King Kamehameha of the Sandwich Islands arrived at Southampton on Saturday, on a visit to Lady Franklin.

A private letter received in London gives an account of a sudden storm at St. Petersburg a few nights ago, which is represented as having done much damage.

The Briton, arrived from the Cape of Good Hope, brings further news of the fearful gale there. The wrecks were numerous and the loss of life great. The Faulconi, one of the Black Ball vessels, had been wrecked on Royal Mails; she had a large number of cabin on board. Her officers and crew, with the exception of seventeen had perished in the wreck. Several other lesser vessels were also lost.

Forty-three more passengers of the William Nelson, which was burnt at sea, have been picked up in two other boats. Among the rescued is the master of the vessel, who appears to have done his duty faithfully. The burning of the ship was occasioned by the exploding of some fat in the cook's galley, which communicated with the fire used in the apparatus for its heat. The Journal des Débats publishes letters from many passengers and has been blamed at Newfoundland by the Bishop, for not having Paris Bread to Apostasize.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Prince Imperial was unwell the early part of the week, but Wednesday's Moniteur announces that his health is completely re-established.

The Emperor left Paris on Wednesday morning for Plombières.

On Thursday week the Empress Eugénie accompanied by the Minister of the Interior, visited the portion of the prison of St. Lazare reserved for young girls. Her Majesty examined the chapel, workshop, refectory, kitchens, and bakery, everywhere making inquiries of the young prisoners as to the cause of their detention and the manner in which they were treated. In the infirmary a touching scene occurred. Her Majesty, it will be seen, had been informed that a girl, suffering from consumption, was near her end, visited the sufferer, who, in addition to her final wishes, and joined in the prayers of the sisters of charity, who act as nurses. Her Majesty's visit lasted two hours and a half.

M. Ilbain, the Mexican Envoy, whose mission gave rise to so much speculation, has left Paris, and is on his way back to Mexico.

A letter from Rome says that there are Austrian troops there at the present time than were ever known. Some of the largest Parisian hotels are already engaged for the winter season.

The Moniteur publishes the regulations for the Universal Exhibition of 1867, as drawn up by the commissioners and authorised by an Imperial decree of the 12th inst. The first article of the document, which fills nearly twelve columns of the journal, is as follows:—"The Universal Exhibition to be held in Paris in 1867 will receive the works of art and the products of agriculture and manufactures of all nations. It will take place in the Champs-de-Mars, in a temporary edifice. Round the Palace of the Exhibition a park will be made to receive living animals and plants, as well as other objects which cannot be installed in the principal edifice. The Exhibition will open on April 1, and close on Oct. 31."

A new cuirassed frigate is about to be built at Cherbourg, to be called the Solferino. It will be armed with 16 rifled 50-pounders, the old frigate of the same name, which will be turned into a floating magazine. The new ship will be a sister of conical form, will be iron-plated throughout, and be armed with heavy ordnance.

The journals announce that the Count de Segonzac, the death of Count Joseph M'Mahon, brother of the Duc de Magenta.

SPAIN.

Italy having been duly recognised, the Queen has approved the nomination of Senor Ulloa as Spanish Minister at Florence.

The disagreement between Spain and Chili, it is announced, has been amicably settled. Chili is to pay compensation for the Covadonga factory to Spain.

The Queen has accepted Cardinal Puente's resignation of his office as Ecclesiastical Preceptor to the Prince of the Asturias, and the office has been suppressed.

ITALY.

The Minister of Public Instruction has issued a circular to the scholastic inspectors of the Roman provinces, directing them to proceed to visit the secondary and primary ecclesiastical seminaries of Tuscany, with the object of ascertaining the number of students in those institutions, and also whether the laws and the scholastic regulations are duly observed.

The Pope has left Rome for Castel Gandolfo, his country residence. M. de Sartiges, the French Ambassador, has set out for France, on leave of absence.

AUSTRIA.

No further obstacle exists to the adoption by the Reichsrath of the Budget for 1865, as in Tuesday's sitting of the finance committee, composed of members of the Upper and Lower Houses, it was carried at upon the principal point of difference between them, the Upper House agreeing to the Loan of 80,000,000 florins, of which one-half fund should be raised by 200,000 florins.

An Imperial Rescript has published relieving Count Palffy of his position as Governor of Hungary. It is asserted that all the Polish and Hungarian Political prisoners will be amnestied on former on the birthday of the Emperor, and the latter on the feast of St. Stephen, the patron of Hungary.

SWITZERLAND.

The Federal Assembly is to be convoked for an extraordinary sitting on the 23rd of August next, for the purpose of revising the Federal Constitution.

PRUSSIA.

A Royal decree has been published at Berlin declaring the Budget for 1865, as proposed by the Ministry, to be the financial law for the current year. It has been made to the expense of the Prussian Marine the sum of 500,000 thalers for the construction of rifled cannon for the fleet. The further employment of which amount the Minister will make a special report to the Chambers at the end of the year. The above decree, setting aside the great constitutional right of the Lower House, bears date Berlin, July 1, 1865, and is countersigned by all the Ministers.

HOLLAND.

The Second Chamber of the States General has, with the exception of one adverse vote, unanimously approved the treaty of commerce with France.

TURKEY.

The Sultan has entirely recovered from his recent indisposition.

The ex-Grand Viziers Ruchdi and Kiprisli Pachas have been recalled to office as Ministers without portfolio.

The Kustendji portal service has been temporarily closed by the Austrian authorities on account of rumours of cholera in Turkey.

The cholera in Egypt is disappearing; but in Constantinople it is spreading, notwithstanding the strict sanitary precautions that are said to have been adopted.

UNITED STATES.

The assassination trials are over, and the sentences partly carried out. Payne, Harrold, Atzerodt, and Mrs. Surratt were hanged on the 7th inst. The Judge of the Supreme Court had previously served a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Mrs. Surratt, but the Cabinet, to which, by President Johnson's order, was not obeyed. It is stated that Payne, previous to his execution, confessed Dr. Mudd, Arnold, and that another person had subscribed to an affidavit impeaching the testimony of Weichmann and Gaither Dr. Mudd, Arnold, Spangler, and O'Laughlin are to be imprisoned, with hard labour, for life; and Spangler, for the first year, is to be imprisoned, with hard labour, for six years.

In Philadelphia the Provost Marshal having, by order from Washington, surrendered a prisoner named Cozens to the Sheriff, Judge Thompson has since rebuked him, declaring that the President's power to order the release of prisoners rests with the Congressional and not with the war.

President Johnson's health is somewhat improved, but he is still unable to receive visitors. The health of Mr. F. W. Seward continues favourable.

Independence Day, the 4th of July, was celebrated with more than usual enthusiasm throughout the country.

President Johnson has issued a proclamation appointing Benjamin Perry Provisional Governor of South Carolina. In this and other States, except Florida, have now either provisional or elected local governments. In the latter the civil governments are much more copious than interesting.

Senator Sumner declares the statement that all the white volunteer troops of the army would be mustered out of service at the earliest possible date. It was proposed that, by the middle of August, there would not be 10,000 remaining in the whole of General Meade's military division of the Atlantic.

Advices from the west report the capture of several desperate guerrillas and murderers.

The military authorities of Richmond had taken precautionary measures against an apprehended negro insurrection.

The Government are making arrangements to send to Atlantam a sufficient quantity of supplies to relieve the necessities of the people in that district, who for some time past had been reduced to the last extremities of famine.

A committee of delegates, representing the coloured population of Virginia, was to meet in Alexandria on the 2nd of August, to consider the condition and prospects of the race.

The number of applicants to the President for pardon average between 200 and 300 a day. Pauses were issued one day granting pardon to 160, mostly North Carolinians.

The States of Wisconsin and Iowa have been visited by terrible tornadoes. The village of Viroqua, Vernon County, Wisconsin, a place of about 1200 inhabitants, was nearly destroyed. Seventeen persons were killed and more than a hundred badly injured. The loss of property was very great. In Iowa the crops were badly damaged, farm-houses and barns destroyed, and serious damage done in several counties. Heavy rains accompanied the tornadoes in Iowa.

Large numbers of Federal troops were landing along the Texas coast at the mouth of the Rio Grande. Six thousand troops, mostly coloured, had arrived at Brazos. A detachment had been sent up the river, and occupied Eagle Pass.

The Herald states that the Government had received official information that Spain would consolidate the Stonewall to the United States.

MEXICO.

Advices from Vera Cruz to the 23rd ult. represent everything as favourable to the Imperialists. They had reoccupied Saltillo and Monterey. It was reported that Santiago Vidaurri had been killed.

The Emperor Maximilian has issued a manifesto leaving religious question in the hands of the bishops, declaring that the Government will not interfere in religious matters.

AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.

MELBOURNE, May 26.

Talk of the first mild day of March, indeed! Wordsworth was a first-class poet and a psychologist—he treated qualifications, perhaps, the first in many Australian minds—but he knew nothing of the seasons, spring, and climate of Australia. We have got it at last—thank Heaven for it. Why, the air is like drinking a kiss; loud and lovely, it seems as though it could make love to you. The rainfall has been an oddity even in this region of oddities. The worst of the climate out-doors is the dust, which penetrates to the very pit. As to heat and cold, that is very intelligible. Melbourne stands midway between the great extremes of tropic and equatorial temperature. The only notion of people taking a hip-bath in fire to be forthwith cooled down in ice would be received in this city as an unlimed lunacy. Not that the climate is unhealthy; on the contrary, it is eminently healthy; but the way the wind jumps about is certainly trying. It blows from the north, south, east, and west, blows from the south and is England—and all within half a dozen hours. But this hits climates, and suits us. Colds and coughs are things of the shops. She wants neither convicts, patronage, nor sentiment; but she always wants people who can work. Those who have hands and brains are at zero. She has had no wet this year, during which the nominal quietness has been one of the most remarkable. Agriculture has been great accordingly. To you, at home, these matters may seem insignificant; but they are looked to by stokes to the hundreds and thousands of fine, high-spirited young fellows who are now coming out. Warm them, in time, that only two classes get on here—fellows who work with their hands, or their heads, or their hearts. No one can make a squatting-station pay with less than five thousand sheep, and a working man can't get five thousand. Then come the extras. As pasturage pays, on the average, over 16 per cent, the demand for land of high quality, as you may see by any, struggling men, are swimming in wealth, jump at any chance of purchasing the land they have rented for a trifle. The great cry of exploring expedition has made a hit, and revealed a new grass region, the finest you ever clapped eyes on. Water is the want of the great drawback. Hydraulic engineering is the sine qua non out here. We shall have to go in for the arterial rivers and mountain streamlets, as in Mesopotamia, or come to the same end. The intense drought has brought this matter to a climax. Even an Australian Parliament is beginning to see that a few hundred such arrangements will, among other things, be done.

Hooray! part of the Englishman's subject (we are all Englishmen out here, though you do not seem aware of the fact), the weather, I shall address to you. Our politics we write of, and our social news is principally because the delinquents are in London, or, at all events, Great Britain—not in Australia. Mail-steam, then, is the engine we have to complain of the late arrival of the European mail—the Panama Steamship Company. It is not on this line, but beyond Hobson's Bay with the March mails till the 14th inst., three days behind time. The public are getting thoroughly disgusted with the way in which the new arrangements are now carried out by the Peninsular and Oriental Company. An enormous subsidy is paid to this company for the carriage of their contract; and they have not once, during the last seven or eight months, delivered the Australian mails up to time. In fact, the whole of the company that would give the natter anything like proper attention, the Australian mail service would be a source of immense profit-making. The P. and O. Company's contract expires at the end of the current year, when it will be hoped such arrangements will be made with them or some other steam company, as will secure for the colonists their mails regularly. Such a thing as delay in the course of our very life blood—punctual mail communication with England.

Wednesday, the 24th inst., was observed as the Queen's birthday; and the manner in which the festivities were honoured was highly creditable and attachment of the people in this part of the world to her Majesty and her throne. The weather was all that could be desired. Early and late, as the day was kept as a holiday at all the Government offices, banks, &c., throughout the city and suburbs. Business began to run on early hour wending their way in all directions. The great event was the volunteer review, which was most attended by our auxiliary soldiers, who acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of his Excellency and the public. The highest expectations were realised in the manœuvres. In the afternoon Governor Sir Charles Darling held a levee at his residence, when numerous officers of all ranks and classes attended to pay their respects to the representative of Royalty. In the evening the streets were thronged with holiday folk to see the fireworks and illuminations. The latter were neither very numerous nor very brilliant, with the exception of that in front of the Argus office, where the effect was very good, and which was illuminated for the first time in the colony.

Parliament is still in session, and is expected to sit for several weeks yet. The winter has been an eventful one to many of the members of the Lower House, who have recently had to attend to their duties in the character of their forced legislative dreams; but, alas for the instability of human affairs, the majority of these gentlemen are quadrupeds. For the bill for the payment of members, by which the modest appropriation of £200 was to be given to all who had to take the House through its different stages; but, unfortunately for the needy ones, the bill was rejected by the Upper House on the motion for its first reading being carried by a majority of what would be equal to twenty to the massive of the Session has, as may well be imagined, not entirely been the delight of the most amiable feelings between the two Houses. Hence their coming to a deadlock on more than one occasion. His Excellency has, I am glad to say, the full confidence of the country, but has not only maintained its independence, but has saved the country from the effects of a hasty, selfish, and ill-considered legislation. The tariff question still remains unsettled. Government measures are to be brought forward early in August; the land question Bill, and the Upper House will as surely reject the two. The Mining Bill, a measure of the greatest importance to the future of our community, is now before the Assembly, and the question of our defences will also be disposed of before the struggle between the two Houses comes on. Last night, or rather yesterday, the Treasurer submitted his plans for the defence of the colony. He proposes to raise £200,000, by loan, for carrying out his object, and to ask the assistance of the home Government, probably to the extent of requesting the grant of a blockship. The subject is one of great importance, and, as it will be treated in an party spirit, the probability is that either the Government scheme or some other equally efficient one will be adopted. The further consideration of the matter was postponed till Thursday next.

The new Land Act is now in full operation. Monday last was the first day upon which agricultural areas were proclaimed open for selection; and the number of bona fide selectors who took up land on that occasion excited the liveliest hopes as to the future agricultural prospects of the colony. The Government certainly deserves credit for the precautions it took to protect the honest farmer in his endeavours to secure a homestead for himself and his family. It has been ascertained that nearly all the land taken up in the neighbourhood of Melbourne, at Hamilton, and Geelong, has fallen into the hands of people who intend to reside upon and cultivate it.

An exhibition of gems and jewellery was recently held under the auspices of the Royal Society of Victoria. The collection embraced several valuable gems, both colonial and foreign, as well as a varied assortment of jewellery of Victorian and British manufacture.

We have dates from Sydney to May 26. Parliament was expected to close in the course of a few days, all the estimates having passed. In the Assembly, on May 25, the Government carried a motion, ayes of 18, and an increase of 20 per cent on all articles in the present tariff, and added a duration to raise the duties from 10 to 15 per cent for ten years, to meet the existing deficit. The proposal for increased taxation is opposed by much dissatisfaction, and it is thought the Government will not be able to carry it. The mineral from which parallic oil is extracted is obtainable in large quantities near Hartley, and machinery for carrying on extensive operations is about to be erected there. The police force of New South Wales, 1,000 strong, under them by there of Victoria in dealing with the notorious Morgan, have succeeded in shooting two more of the bushrangers, who, for such a length of time, kept the colony in a state of alarm. One of them, Gilbert have both been killed by the police, and it is reported that Dunn is captured. The whole of this gang of ruffians will now pay with the penalty of their misdeeds, and in a summary manner.

The third Session of Parliament at Auckland was opened on the 2nd of May. The prospects of the cotton crop are encouraging. It is expected that over two bales to the acre will be gathered in many parts this year. Efforts are being made to have mail communication with Europe, via Torres Strait and India.

Our dates from Adelaide are to the 26th of May. The port has been visited by a severe storm and heavy rain, which did great damage, sweeping away extensive embankments. Four seas were drowned in attempting to land the English mail from the branch steamer. The Corporation has levied a rate of 1s. in the pound on the property by the inundation. The South Australian Parliament has resolved to let the railway lines on short leases to the contractors for the first twenty next. The revenue for the year ending the 31st of March shows an increase, as compared with the previous year, of £170,000.

In New Zealand affairs have come to a deadlock. The steamer Akaroha arrived at Hobson's Bay last night with despatches from General Cameron to the Imperial Government, for transmission by the Nile, which sails at two o'clock to-day. That these despatches are of great importance may be inferred from the fact that a special steamer has been employed to bring them over. General Cameron has withdrawn from the Government of which he was said he receives a reply to the despatches he is now sending home. The following memorandum is the unofficial cause of the retirement of this step:—

MEMORANDUM BY MINISTERS.—In reference to certain statements made by Lieutenant-General Sir Duncan A. Cameron, which have been communicated by the Governor to his responsible advisers, they cannot conceal their regret that the Lieutenant-General should have thought fit to attribute base and unworthy motives to a portion of the colonists and to the civil authorities and men to the Ministry of New Zealand, and, by implication, to her Majesty's Government, in the course of the military operations which he reports to be in character of a war which, it is to be duly to uphold and to their own which, as public men, is the property of the country. They are not prepared to accept assistance on any conditions tendered, which would have the effect that real and energy (which alone can secure success or lead to any useful result in operations in the field) will be shackled by the control of officers incompetent, in support of a cause which is branded by him with such severe reprobation.—FRED. A. WELD, 24th May, 1865.

It appears the campaign was a put scheme of the Governor and Ministers, but found no favour with the Imperial authorities, who demanded 1000 more men. The Governor has publicly declared that either he or the General must go home. Neither of the military authorities will take the slightest responsibility for the result of the war in the North. Meanwhile the disaffected and rebellious Maories are becoming more confident; and the prospect of a war of races looms ominously in the not very distant future.

A piece of land, occupying a site of 2500 ft., in Cannon-street, at the corner of the Church-yard, was sold yesterday week for £10,000.

Advices from Smyrna to the 7th state that the town of Aidin, which was occupying a site of Tralles, Hiald the town was destroyed and many lives were lost.—Intelligence has also been received of the final destruction of the town of the Seventh Day Adventists, in the province of Wermland. Of the public and private buildings in the town only three remain—the bishop's residence, the hospital, and the prison; all the rest, including the cathedral, being nothing but a heap of smoking ruins, the population of about 5000 being left without a roof to cover them. For lives, however, were lost.

An exhibition of the products of the working classes resident in the east of London has been opened in St. Mary's Rebeet-room, Whitechapel-road. The opening ceremony was performed on Thursday week by the Earl of Shaftesbury, and the occasion was honoured by the presence of a large assemblage. The attendance each day since has been numerous. The contents of the exhibition and the general arrangements cannot be spoken of in terms of praise. The exhibition is may be considered as one which will have taken place in the metropolis, and, in some respects, the most interesting that has yet been held. Amongst the articles sent for exhibition are those of a varied nature, such as arts, mechanical productions, models, and miscellaneous—in each of which the working classes of the district figure in highly creditable manner.

The report of the Ecclesiological Society states, among many expressions of opinion, the following facts of public interest:—Mr. Beales has offered a prize for open competition, and the council of the Ecclesiological society has agreed to reject the prize for transparent carvings the prize of the president being added to it, for 1865. Messrs. Baskin, J. C. Robinson, and W. Burges will join the committee as judges in this matter. Mr. Brumpton, an English architect, has obtained the prize offered by the Belgian Guild of St. Thomas and St. Luke for the best designs for a parish church. Count de Vegas has been elected an honorary member of the society. Two important works on Spanish antiquities and church furniture and decoration are in progress at the expense of the Spanish Government.

COUNTRY NEWS.

A sudden death, in consequence of excitement at elections, has occurred at Bromyard, where an old man, named Meadowcroft, was seized with a fit at the hustings and died.

A young lady, on a visit at Hartlepool, fell asleep, one day last week, on a rock at some distance from the shore, and was cut off by the tide. Whilst a raft was being made for her rescue, an Irishman swam off with a rope and drew her safely to the shore.

A testimonial, consisting of a handsome service of silver plate, has been presented to Mr. J. D. Cuvaglia, the agent of the National Bank at Cork, by about 400 of the principal inhabitants of that city, upon his leaving that town to fill the position of the manager of the National and Provincial Bank in London.

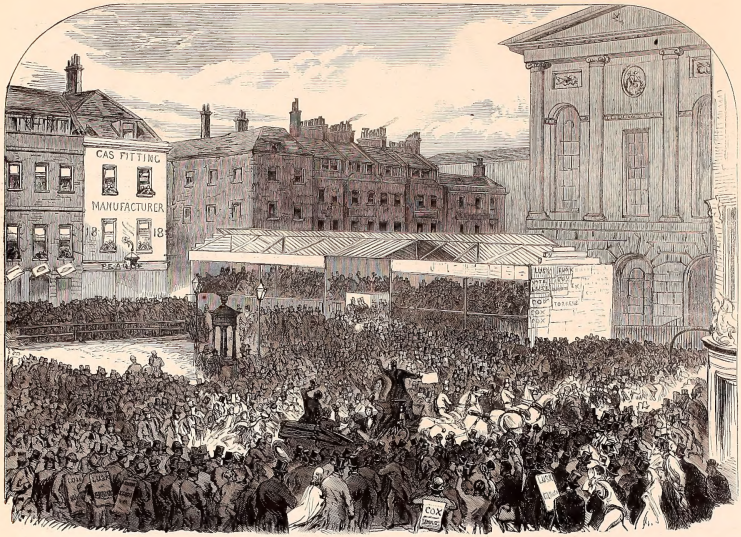
The Cork Examiner says:—"We are glad to hear that some antiquarian discoveries have been made by Colonel Lane Fox in the Bloscpot Island, and in the neighbourhood of Ballycastle, in the county of Antrim. Several ancient, called cemeteries, are to be found on the islands, and amongst these Colonel Fox has discovered a number of skeletons and ancient relics."

A valuable gold watch was presented last Saturday to a Brixham Captain by Mr. H. Hallett, shipping master of that port, in the name of the Prudential Life Assurance Company. The watch is valued at £100. The front represents the rescue of a shipwrecked seaman, with a wrecked vessel, and steamer in the distance. On the back is the United States shield in enamel, and inside the front case is the following inscription:—"The Life Assurance Company of the United States, New York, to Captain —— of the American schooner Maria Hallett, 1865."

The shop of Mr. W. M'Feran, jeweller and watchmaker, in Victoria-street, Manchester, was entered by thieves on Monday night, and stock was stolen of the net value of £1,000. The thieves broke through a wall from a private passage into the shop of Mr. Nathan, and drawer by drawer broke through the wall they entered Mr. M'Feran's. A sum of £50 has been offered for the apprehension of the thieves.

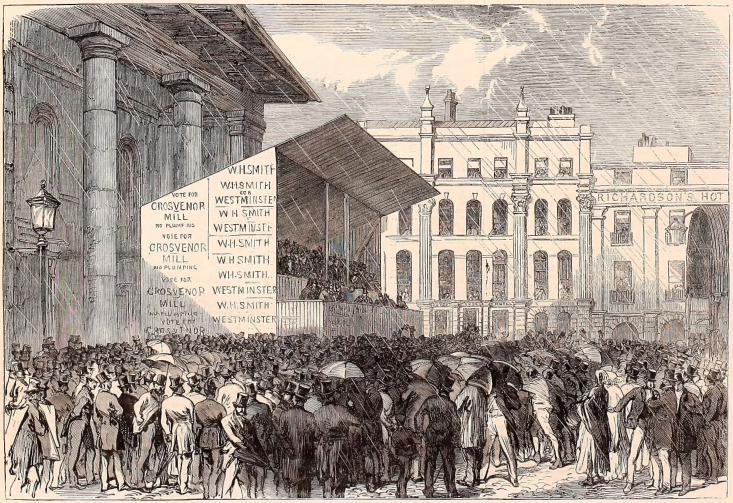
There have been several election riots. At Grantham the poll had to be adjourned to the following day. At Nottingham the Riot Act was read, and the military were under the town in great readiness for any emergency. But the police of barristers and brutality seems to have been reserved for Glasgow. The Liberal candidate was defeated, a number of Reformers assembled, and entered themselves for three hours, with little interruption, on the destruction and furniture of the Conservative premises. After the mischief was done, a detachment of the Guards was telegraphed for from Windsor; and the Reformers were dispersed on the arrival of the detachment obtained. At Chichester a desperate fight took place, and many persons were severely injured. At Bridport, Dorsetshire, a mob of 2000 persons had an unoffending partisan of Colonel Berkeley was shot dead, at Cheltenham.

LAW.—The Lord Chief Justice of England, Mr. Justice Blackburn, and Mr. Justice Mellor, and the grand jury brought to a true bill against Constance Kent for the murder of Saville.



At the Warwick Assizes, on Thursday week, Hannah Maria Wedgwood, the wife of Mr. William Hume Wedgwood, of Greyfriars Hall, Hampshire, was indicted for forging and uttering a promissory note for £1000, at Birmingham, on the 16th of March last, with intent to defraud the prosecutor. In 1861 the prisoner commenced negotiating loans with Mr. Williams, solicitor, of Birmingham, after representing herself as a widow lady. Mr. Jones, of Westfield Hall, Saltley, had made a will bequeathing her £10,000; but, in consequence of the prisoner having married a second husband, named Wedgwood, without the consent of the trustees, the property was forfeited, and she, through correspondence, through Mr. Williams, a further loan of £1000, which was afterwards by Mr. Williams's advice increased to £2000 by great interest. For this loan a promissory note was given as security, purporting to be signed by Mr. Jones and Mr. Wedgwood, but the forgery of the transactions with Mr. Williams were conducted by the prisoner by correspondence, and in all cases the prisoner acted as the agent of the latter. In some one else; sometimes for Miss Jones, who was her godmother, and sometimes for herself and her sister. Mr. Jones and Mr. Wedgwood were proved to be forgeries. The defence was that the prisoner had acted under the influence and direction of her husband. The jury, after a long deliberation, found the prisoner guilty of uttering the forged note, but not guilty of forgery. She was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment.

On Saturday last Sigismund Schapira, said to be an Austrian, was charged, at the police court at Liverpool, with embezzling the money of Mr. Jacob Behrens, a merchant of that town, by whom he had been employed as clerk with foreign correspondence. The prisoner had been in London, and received notice from the prosecutor. Owing to there being no extradition treaty between this country and Austria, the prisoner was discharged.



Mr. S. Greves, late notary and secretary to the Canterbury savings bank, was brought, on Thursday week, before the city magistrates on a charge of having embezzled the sum of £1000, the property of the trustees of the institution. It was stated that the total amount of the defalcations discovered exceeds £2000. The prisoner was committed for trial.

The Coroner's inquiry as to the cause of the death of the convict Gallagher, who was killed by the explosion at Chatham dockyard, has been closed. After the Coroner had summed up, the jury deliberated for several hours, and returned a verdict that the explosion agreed to a verdict that the explosion was caused by the negligence of the manager in not having constructed the a trap-door had been put up, and in not ensuring the accumulation of gunpowder. The manager was committed to take his trial at the next Maidstone Assizes, was committed for trial to the next Maidstone Assizes.

THE ELECTIONS IN THE METROPOLITAN BOROUGHS.

FINSBURY ELECTION: THE NOMINATION ON CLERKENWELL GREEN.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION: THE NOMINATION IN COVENT-GARDEN.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

LAMBETH ELECTION: THE NOMINATION AT KENNINGTON PARK.

THE GLOUCESTERSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY AT TEWKESBURY.

THE meeting of the Gloucestershire Agricultural Society at Tewkesbury, continuing for several days last week, attracted many visitors to that pleasant little town, which is situated at the junction of the Avon and Severn, about ten miles from Gloucester. There was not only a cattle show on this occasion, but a flower show also, under the auspices of the local Horticultural Society; and the amusements of the week were further increased by the annual regatta, and by a series of public competitions in various athletic sports. The band of the Royal Marines, from Woolwich, was in attendance on the Wednesday and Thursday, besides the artillery and engineer bands from Gloucester, and some of the volunteer corps. Our Illustration gives a view of the Regatta Field, as it is called, a meadow between the two rivers, where the booths or marquees occupied by some departments of the exhibition were pitched. The town of Tewkesbury, with the fine tower of its ancient abbey, is seen behind.

ELECTION SCENES IN THE METROPOLIS.

THE general election of 1865 will be distinguished in the annals of our representative system by some features most happily characteristic of an improved public spirit in several of the largest constituencies, and especially in the electoral districts of the vast city of London. Never have the results of polling in the City and the leading metropolitan boroughs, contested by rival candidates for parliamentary honours, evinced a more wholesome disposition to look to the personal merits of the men proposed; and the names of Goschen, Stuart Mill, Torrens, and Hughes, as the chosen members for Old London, Westminster, Finsbury, and Lambeth, are ample proof of the esteem in which high intellectual and literary abilities are held by the inhabitants of these populous abodes of industry and trade. We present, in this number of our Journal, four Illustrations of the scenes at the nomination of candidates last week. The Engraving on our front page showing the nomination for the city of London, in Guildhall, on the Monday morning; while the subjects of the remaining three Illustrations are taken, respectively, from the Westminster nomination, in Covent-garden; the Lambeth nomination, in front of the main entrance to Kensington Park, also on the Monday morning; and the Finsbury nomination, which took place next day on Clerkenwell-green.

At the City nomination, in Guildhall, where Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Rose presided, the hustings was graced by the presence of Royalty: her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, accompanied by the Prince of Orange and the Prince and Princess of Saxe-Weimar, with Lord Linmore and Lady Cowley, being accommodated with reserved seats, as privileged spectators of a rather tumultuous scene. There was, however, nothing to distinguish the occasion from previous nominations for the City. There was the same array of barriers, the same gathering of the friends and supporters of the different candidates, and the same densely-packed mass of—by courtesy—liverymen and electors of the city of London. The body of the hall, or at least the half of it that was available for the purpose, was pretty equally divided between the friends of Mr. Cubitt and those of the Conservative candidates. The former, however, were first in the field, and had secured the space nearest the hustings. But the proceedings were characterised by the utmost good humour, but, at the same time, by a rivalry of application between the opposing sections which rendered cheers, counter-cheers, and candidates alike inaudible at a few feet from those they stood by. The business was nevertheless performed. Mr. Rothschild was proposed by Mr. C. Buxton and seconded by Mr. W. Lord; Mr. R. W. Crawford was proposed by Mr. Gervoise Smith and seconded by Mr. G. Moore; Mr. Deputy Lawrence was proposed by Mr. J. A. Hunkey and seconded by Mr. J. P. Gassiott; Mr. Ignill was proposed by Mr. T. Baring and seconded by Mr. Masterman; Alderman William Lawrence, late Lord Mayor, was proposed by Mr. R. Hanbury and seconded by Mr. R. Sadleir; Mr. Fowler was proposed by Mr. Gibbs and seconded by Alderman Finnis; Mr. Leopold Rothschild was proposed by his brother, always from ill-health; Mr. Crawford, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Lyall, Alderman Wilson, and Mr. Fowler were the successful candidates. When retiring Alderman then put the names of the several candidates to the electors in the order in which they had been proposed, and declared the show of hands to be in favour—first, of Mr. Crawford; second, of Mr. Goschen; third, of Baron Rothschild; and fourth, of Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence. A poll was demanded by the friends of the candidates last we have already stated with what result.

At the Westminster nomination, Sir Scott Turner, High Bailiff, presided. Captain Robert Grosvenor was proposed by Serjeant Ticer and seconded by Mr. Bidgood; Mr. John Stuart Mill was proposed by Dr. Brewer and seconded by Mr. Malleson; Mr. W. H. Smith was proposed by Mr. J. Lettsom and seconded by Mr. Hall; Sir Percy Shelley was proposed by Mr. Mill and Mr. Smith addressed the electors in turn, but only the reporters could hear them. A show of hands was taken, and was declared to be in favour of Captain Grosvenor and Mr. Smith. The poll was demanded for Mr. Mill, and we know the result.

In London the returning officer for the City presided at the nomination. Mr. Frederick Doulton was proposed by Dr. Evans and seconded by Mr. James Hollingsworth, a carriage and four, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of his supporters. Mr. Alfred Cox, the returning officer, presided. Mr. Cox was proposed by Mr. Hollingsworth and seconded by Mr. Shillibeer; Alderman Lusk was proposed by Mr. Thompson and seconded by Mr. Surr; Mr. Alfred Cox was proposed by Mr. Tidmarsh and seconded by Mr. G. Routledge; Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens was proposed by Mr. Haywood and seconded by Mr. Tyler; Mr. Ferrill was proposed by Mr. Jones and seconded by another elector. The five candidates having spoken, the show of hands was taken, and declared in favour of Mr. Cox and Mr. Ferrill. The poll was demanded by the other three, two of whom were ultimately successful, as recorded elsewhere.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1865.

No offence to St. John Nepomuk, who, for being thrown off a bridge and drowned, was made the patron saint of bridges, that kind of erection has no longer the great interest which it had in the infancy of engineering. Then, it was an enormous thing to fling a road across a chasm or a flood. Now a railway company takes such undertakings almost as matters of course for them in a general guess. Nay, the grandest bridge of all is, according to one of our poets, no longer solemn. Keats has complained that "there was an awful rainbow, once, in heaven," but that cold philosophy has told us exactly how it is made—each wood, each fragment—and that it is now in the dull catalogue of common things. Therefore, and in existing circumstances, it may be difficult to get up any very violent excitement over the commencement of Thursday last. And yet the addition of a splendid new bridge to the metropolis is an historical affair.

We will not forestall the more elaborate descriptions of the proceedings and the foundation-stone of the new bridge at Blackfriars; nor will we discuss whether it should be called Shakspeare Bridge, or Election Bridge, or Palmerston Bridge. In regard to the name, indeed, the people of London settle these things for themselves. The Lord Mayor and his aldermen, when they laid the first stone of Mylne's bridge, now destroyed, were pleased to declare that for a great many glorious reasons, which we need not cite, "the citizens of London have unanimously voted the bridge to be inscribed with the name of William Pitt." But London would not call it so, and Blackfriars it has remained; and, archæologically considered, the old name, which from a topographical fact, is preferable to any other. We have turned to the records of the time when the Mylne bridge was begun, and it may not be uninteresting to recall some of the facts that must have been in the minds of Lord Mayor Cubitt, Prince, and his friends, as they stood in the north abutment, and performed the rites repeated by Lord Mayor Stormes Hale, and his friends, on the south side, on Tuesday.

George II. had just died, and people were writing stanzas on the very opposite incident. Readers of Horace Walpole will remember the details, and how thankful Horace was to the King for dying just in time to save the great epistle-writer from the necessity of composing verses "at sea, of course, and early in the month—October, 1760—news came of the surrender to us of Montreal and Canada; and Mr. Secretary Pitt advertised that every gun in the Tower and in the Park, and the Park and Tower guns were fired. We were sending a large train of brass artillery from the Tower to Portsmouth, a grand expedition being on foot; but we broke up the camp at Winchester and sent the militia home, the principal preparing for embarkation. Hardy sailed from Spithead to join Hawke. We were otherwise martial. The King, in Hyde Park, reviewed a regiment of light dragoons; and a new experiment was tried of a shell charged with fuming cast bullets, which threw out a great smoke, and would (we are ashamed to write) be useful in covering a retreat. Later, the King stood in the portico of Kensington Palace to see the Guards marching for Portsmouth. On Saturday, the 25th, the King dropped down and died, and next day was proclaimed a King who had sixty years to reign. The country was in the usual state of loyal excitement, addresses were pouring in from all quarters, and it was in the midst of all this, and on the 31st of October, that the first stone of the new bridge was laid.

Let us see, a little, what the exalted persons were about. William Macarty and Mary Fagan were sentenced to death at the Old Bailey on the 24th—the latter for theft, the former for murder. Macarty was executed the next morning at the bottom of Bow-street, Covent-garden, where the inhabitants would now be somewhat astonished to see a gibbet arise. His body was removed to Finchley-common, and hung in chains; but two months later it was stolen, the gibbet itself being sawn away at the bottom. We shall hear of Mary by-and-by. Mr. Mackelyne and assistants were dispatched to St. Helena to observe the approaching transit of Venus over the sun; but the French, as usual, did the scientific work more magnificently, sending one astronomer to the Abbissian ocean, one to the north of Siberia, and one to Pondicherry. Mr. Foote, the dramatist and actor, had been assailed by various persons for his portrait of a religious hypocrite, in "The Minor," and was defending himself with his customary recklessness, and generally getting the best of his awkward enemies. Mr. (not then Doctor) Johnson was a power in literature, and he had written, in the public prints, his letters in the Gazetteer, attacking the plan of Mr. Mylne for this very bridge.

The question was whether elliptic or semicircular arches were preferable. Mylne adopted the former, and Johnson, writing on behalf of Mr. Gwyn, advocated the latter. But he was on good terms with the Scotchman, Mylne, and dined with him. It may be edifying to hear the egregious Boswell, who was a warm admirer of Johnson (as, indeed, every Scot ought, or thought, Johnson, of course, read up for the argument, did his best, and there was an end; but Boswell thinks it necessary to show that such a course was not wrong, for lawyers and legislators do it every day. In regard to the suitability of the fabric, that the best stone was selected, and that, up to the time of his writing, it had never sunk, either in the foundation or the arches. A different tale has had to be told later; but the river is no longer what it was when Mr. Mylne erected his bridge.

Mad dogs had much terrified the people during the summer and autumn, and letters of a very sanguinary character appeared in the papers, offering to shoot men, armed with a gun on a small dog in Soho-square and slew it, and the enraged owner threatened dire vengeance. It is more than a hundred years ago, and even wise men were remonstrating with fools for killing so many dogs, telling them that the fear that he "might" go mad, and then that they should do the same, was felt then, and is felt now. The City was to be improved, and great eateries were made about the narrowness of the streets and the inadequate area offered by the traffic, "which ever was never so great in any civilised city." One writer hoped that the noble Duke colman called the Monument might be removed from the line of street it stood in, and take place where the Standard in Cornhill stood. This little arrangement has not yet been carried out. The theory of the ventilation of public buildings was beginning to receive attention, and the enormous advantage of "air-trunks" was being set forth. On the 22nd of that day was tying experiments on the subject in the House of Commons, when empty and when members were in attendance. At Bath two subscription-books were opened—for prayers at the Abbey and for a theatrical benefit; and the cheapness of all the gamesters. 467. Now, we imagine, neither party would get anything. Let us end with the pleasant record that the young King had been pleased to grant a free pardon to poor Mary Fagan, who had only taken some money (from its amount most probably the produce of robbery) from a sleeping labourer in a field.

Such were the topics of conversation around the foundation-stone of the bridge of 1760. We all know what is being said in 1865; but who will have the writing of the remark thereof when a third bridge is founded?

Viscountess gave a grand entertainment to the Queen of the Netherlands, the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Crown Prince of Portugal, and other distinguished guests, which surpassed in magnificence the most splendid of the season.

THE ELECTION.

At the close of last week the general election passed out of its first phase—namely, the borough returns in England. The chronicle of the latest contests of these constituencies is interesting enough to compel us to abridge the decision of a very important constituency. A good deal has been said about the "Tory reaction" in the provinces, but the results of the election on the fortunes of three or four of the subordinate members of the Ministry, and in fact the overthrow of "Whippism" has collapsed. Poetical justice, however, has been satisfied in political action by the fact that Mr. Whitmore, a very effective Conservative debater, has been ousted from an hereditary borough, one seat in which has been held by his family for a period of upwards of a century. At last a Whig was returned for Bridgnorth before the Reform Act, and has done so ever since. There is still greater significance in the defeat that has overtaken Mr. Bankes, who, cute out of the closets of boroughs, for the successful candidate is Sir Paul Gaudwille, and his election causes that singleness of representation of English constituencies which has been destroyed by the system of contested by Lord Edward Howard, to cease. It is but fair, however, to add that the seat was won from Mr. Whitmore by Mr. Bancroft for before Mr. Baines is members; while a similar influence in Leverpool, where Mr. Horsfall, the representative of Liverpool, has given Mr. Ewart and given the representation wholly to the credit of the Liberal party. Another interesting contest was that for Bridgnorth, where the Bright influence has failed to bring in Mr. Jacob of that borough which has returned Liberal members since the Reform Act was enacted, has helped to send the milder Liberal candidate. Mr. Pollard Urquhart, to the representation of Dumfries and Galloway.

We may be pardoned for believing that for very many of the readers of the Illustrated London News the chief interest of the election will remain special interest of a personal character. It will not have been forgotten that for several years Boston was represented by the gentleman whose name is prefixed to this paragraph, and in a manner which contest extraordinary to all save himself. Amid all the prosperity which rewarded the exertions of Mr. Parkes, he was the person most heartfelt happiness than his being selected by the inhabitants of his native town as their representative. Nothing could be more natural than on whom he received the conduct of his great Journal—those who knew him best will be the most ready to do him justice—than the acquittal of unduly intruding personal topics when, in every few words, he expressed his gratitude to the electors. Of course, we cannot be expected to indulge in the unfeigned valued friend of the late Herbert Ingram. It was equally natural that Mr. Parkes should, in addressing his old friends, remember that it had not to be spoken from the Conservative benches, and that he could not be expected to express to the followed with interest the successful incidents which have marked the career of the gentleman who has been returned by the electors of Boston, and we congratulate them on having elected, in the person of Mr. Parkes, a representative who will command their respect and confidence, with no selfish objects to attain, and one who will feel it an duty not only to Boston, but to the country at large, to attend to the duties of his position, but to labour for the improvement, and the consequent increase in importance, of the town of his old love. Mr. Parkes's return is a triumphant welcome, on his return, after the election, to his home at Shirland, remains to be seen; but we feel sure that the most hearty and friendly of knowing his character enthusiastically confirm the verdict of Boston.

The table-lawn of the English borough with an ironclad sigh over the sidiary of Mr. Malins at Wallingford, which may, perhaps, be alleviated by the knowledge that he has been beaten by a Liberal and determined representative of the South Kensington interest, who is much more likely to figure in the annals of history than the lawyer in all the troubles of vituperative opposition to his clan. Indeed, whenever a Reform Bill comes to be passed in the House of Commons, Mr. Wentworth Dillon will be to be conspicuously absent. The House of Commons can ill spare such a man as Mr. Cowper, but they will be if they get hold of an actual flesh and blood part of it?

Are the record of the great political drama now to be taken to be the elections in Ireland. And here, if nowhere else, it cannot be denied that the tide has flowed in the direction of Ministerial success. The changes in the Irish representation, though not numerous, have been numerous, while the accession of support to the Government are such as must be highly gratifying to them. Waterford, which voted as it ensued, as the result of the decidedly electioneering policy by Ministers towards the Irish Church, which, at present in the House, stands the metropolitan city of the sister isle, where Mr. Vance, a somewhat independent sort of supporter of Ministers, and Mr. Corry Opposition, has been heartily beaten by Mr. Pim, although the steady conservative vote of Sir Robert Gregan will be found to carry the day for the Government in the new members. There is something retributive in the circumstance that a member of the Government should be upon the Bench of Bishops, and that Archbishop Whately should be unanimously (he struck early in the day) from Malbow; for it was the Archbishop who first set on foot Waterford, and would probably have continued to lead it to the last, but that his failure in taste and failing in the power of mind, and the consequent conviction that it should be taken out of his hands. Hitherto, Ministers have been very frightful in the way of losing their supporters in the House, and the Attorney-General for England was last Session exceedingly fortunate in the way of retaining the services of all the law officers for Ireland, none of whom had seats. Now there have been a Lord Lieutenant, a Solicitor-General, a Chief Secretary, and a Lord Justice of Appeal, and a Irish Chief Secretary, a signal preference of "nobility" and "high legal talk." In Galway Lord Dunkellin has succeeded in defeating Mr. Wise, who, though he professed to have no politics except "Galway as a mail-packet station," always voted with the Opposition, has been beaten, and the seat which Lord Dunkellin has exchanged for one for the county of Galway involves no change of voting, as both Mr. Morris and Sir R. Blennerhasset profess to be Liberals, the latter being a Roman Catholic, who, for certain reasons, may well be held not to be of the Ultramontane school. In the last Parliament, Waterford city was of no account to Ministers; for Mr. Blake, though a professing Liberal, was one of those patriotic members who pretended to vote only for Ireland, and not for Ministries, and was, therefore, a cause of squaring trade to respective whippers-in, with whom, on which, he may be supposed to have been always co-operating; while Mr. Bernard was a strong Conservative. The former holds his seat, while the latter, quietly subsiding into a salaried Referee on private bills, has left his place to be occupied by a Liberal, Sir H. Barron. The history of the Athlone election is curious. It runs thus. A London house-agent, but an Irishman, and therefore, no doubt, a gentleman with a pedigree, was suddenly seized with the idea of contesting the county of Galway, where probably his territorial and family rights are buried; and on his journey thither he passed through Athlone. What was the immediate motive cause is not apparent on the surface; but the event is certain that he remained there, forged the election, and beat Mr. Bandi, the former Liberal member, who is a Roman Catholic proprietor of considerable estate in the Irish Midlands, chairman of one of the principal Irish railways, and everything, in short, that could make him the most eligible candidate for a small constituency, in which, as in Galway, there is at present the influence of the greatest proprietor and landed interest in the county. Mr. Bandi's defeat is, as it is personal, and does not affect votes, as Mr. Reardon professes to be a Liberal. The election of Mr. Reardon is characteristically Irish and riotous, and Sir Hugh Cairns appeared in a character quite strange to those who are accustomed to see him in Parliament or even at the Chancery lawyer. His foot was on his native soil; and he was almost as combative as Mr. Whalley. Defeat may notwithstanding. The returns were secured to the Conservatives, although Lord John Hay made very good play for one of them. A very solid contest was gained, and, in a way, a prominent member on the Conservative side, has ended his seat for the county of Lanarkshire, and the name of Dickson is new crowd from the list of members. The Dicksons have been an eclipse of military critics in the house—most of them, by-the-by, owing their rank to the militia and not.

The electioneering fortunes of Scotland have not been particularly various; but, where a change has occurred, they have tended to the Liberal interest. For instance, one of the oldest men and oldest members of the House, Sir Hugh Arbuthnott—who entered the Army in 1794, and has sat for Kincardineshire since 1820, on Conservative politics, has at length retired, and has been succeeded by Mr. Wood, who is a sure Liberal vote; Mr. Boyle, who was returned for Bateshire only in the middle of last Session, has been obliged to yield his place to Mr. Lamont, and a Liberal vote is thus gained; in Linlithgowshire, Major Hamilton, who seemed always to think that the business of a member of Parliament was a passing thing, and who, being good at both sport and to his ability, has been replaced by a Liberal, Mr. M'Lagan; a contest in Renfrewshire has ended in the return of Mr. Caldwell for the county, Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, who has been forced out of his seat by Mr. Caldwell, the Opposition having a vote; while Ayr, and by no means least, Mr. Blackburn, a hearty, genial, sensible member, and a Lord of the Treasury in the Whig Administration of the late Sir Robert Peel, who professes to be a supporter of Ministers.

The Scotch Universities have been for counties made Liberal. The nomination was a scene of much animation, the proposers of the candidates being unable to restrain themselves from enthusiasm. Dr. Lush apparently a surprise to the Scot Surrey electors that Mr. Lowe should present himself to nominate Mr. Charles Buxton, who sought the seat unsolicited, and in the retirement of Mr. Alcock; for probably few of them knew that he had set up a Tuscolum somewhere on the prominent hills surrounding Epsom. It was perhaps on the face of it, a dangerous experiment to have had such a proposer; but political and personal feeling was so strong in favour of the anti-Ministerial opposition, and Mr. Buxton was triumphantly returned, with Mr. Locke King, who is the more prominent part of a political "cake," apologising for the boldness and consistency of his opinions, and declaring that, in order to be free from the trammels of party consequence, though his modesty causes him to be the only person present who did not know it, he was at one time believed to be a Liberal. That Mr. Rooley would retire from the representation of Oxfordshire must have been assured to find how completely they had been mistaken in the support which they had given to an interest conceived, if it was conceived, for physical reasons. That there is no decay of vitality in the Tory party was proved by the circumstance that his hitherto spare, lean form has so expanded that the once slender Squire is now a Knight of the Shire. It was indeed six years ago would now scarcely meet round his loins. In his speech, too, he was full of vigour and fire, and, as to his age, he was almost the very last member to leave the empty House of Commons on the night of the division. Mr. Henley may be taken to be not weary of these sectarian battles which he so sedulously fights. The return with him of Mr. Colonel Corbett and Colonel Taylor are also not the least attempt at disturbing the status quo was even hinted at. The Liberal gain in the counties has been, up to this morning, not significant. In Berkshire, Shrewsbury and Tuboe interest has been neutralised and no Opposition vote lost by the defeat of Lord Dungarvon by Mr. Hedley. Even in South Wilts, where, after the accession of Mr. Sidney Herbert to the Peerage, was lost to Ministers, has been re-established by the return of Mr. Grove. In the East Sussex Mr. Dodson has obtained a colleague more cognate in his views than Lord Pevensey, the eldest son of the person of Lord Clarendon, a brother of the Under Secretary for War; and in North Nottinghamshire the return of Mr. Barrow Simpson, a supporter of Ministers, but by no means to the Government, has been the result of the election.

The election of Mr. Gladstone by the University of Oxford came on no one by surprise. There were those who believed that the system of voting-papers, which has come now into operation at the Universities for the first time, would have a damaging tendency to reference to his constituency; but no one might have hoped that a feeling of admiration for one of the foremost statesmen of our time might have operated in his favour, even the more from the unprejudiced minds, apart from mere political tendency. The result on Mr. Gladstone is probably that he will be returned at the head of the contest for South Lancashire with an exciting scene of freedom of spirit and zeal on which has appeared to be the case with all the seat will at the vigour which are necessary to the carrying out of candidature—a position which, from the beginning of the week, he almost now to him; and success has attended his magnificent efforts.

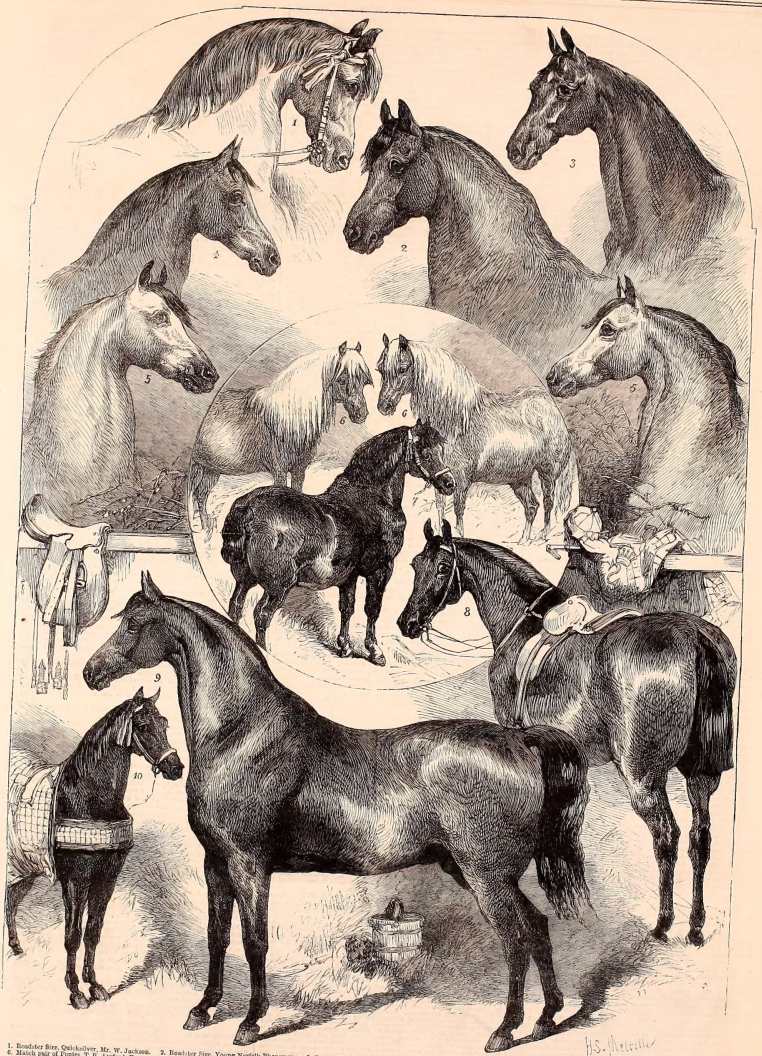
CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

On Wednesday the Archbishop of Canterbury consecrated the new church at Hockley, near Chelmsford.

An Act of Parliament was lately passed for facilitating the annexation of tithes to district churches. The Rector or Vicar of a parish may sell the tithes to a district church with the assent of the Bishop.

By an Act recently passed the law is amended and rendered more efficient for providing houses for the benefit of the poor. The parsonage Queen Anne's Bounty may sell lands for the purpose of the Act.

The newly-consecrated church of St. Augustine, Pownall, Hoxton, was consecrated by the Bishop of London on Monday morning. The Rev. Stewart Smyth, B.A., is appointed minister to the incumbency.



The Bishop of London consecrated the new Church of St. Clement, Arundel-square, and York-place, Barnsbury, yesterday week. The foundation-stone was laid, on the 14th of June, 1864, by Mr. Augustus M.P., by whom the whole of the expenses of building, &c., amounting to between £2000 and £3000, have been defrayed. The church, which is handsome and spacious edifice, is built of brick, and has nave and side aisles, the former being 60ft. in length, and 30ft. in height. The nave and side aisles are separated by solid stone pillars, and the chancel is 30ft. deep. Mr. Gilbert Scott, architect, is to afford sent accommodation for between 700 and 800 persons.

The corner-stone of a new church is to be erected at Constantinople, said, on the 4th inst., by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, in the presence of the ambassadors of Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Sweden, and of Captain Robinson, of her Majesty's ship Banshee, the works—which have advanced fully one third towards completion—were gracefully draped with flags from north to south, and from east to west, forming an appropriate cross of international bunting. Copies of the local papers and coloured the present year were placed in a cavity of the stone. The works, of which an interesting stage was thus consummated, are being vigorously pushed on, and will, it is hoped, be completed early in the coming year.

The following preferments and appointments have recently been made:—The Rev. J. F. Norris to be Canon in Bristol Cathedral; Rev. J. Hind Ian Fox to be Perpetual Curate of Pudsham, Norfolk; Rev. Canon H. Bright to be Curate of St. Nicholas, Hereford; Rev. Charles Lewis Tutor of Worcester College, Oxford, to be Vicar of Stan Ilsley, Berks; Rev. C. A. Huxley to be Curate of St. Andrew with St. Mary Bredman, Canterbury.

PRIZE HORSES AND PONIES AT THE ISLINGTON SHOW.

"As Arabic book to study, a Norfolk colt to ride," formed two out of the bundle of wishes which made up the Rorror philosopher's summum bonum. His horseflesh love would have been gratified in the full at Islington, as never did Norfolk descend on the metropolis in greater force with her roans and her bays. We give (Nos. 1 and 2) the portraits of Quicksilver and Young Norfolk Pitmancum, the first and third prize roadsters. Both are just fifteen two; but the latter is only three years old, and has not attained to the perfect action of the riding-horse of eight-year-old, which stands at a fourteen in the gallery when he was fairly set going. No 3, Lady Florence, was allowed to be the pet of the horse part of the show. She is by Gladiator, who won the Metropolitan Stakes and ran third for the Derby in Hillingdon's year, and was bequeathed by the late Lord Jersey direct to his stud-groom, who has kept him at Cawston ever since. He can be known in the village by the "Gladiator" over the farmers' stepbrother at Market Harborough three seasons after Lady Florence was born, and Lady Florence herself won the first two first hunter prizes before she was shown here. Robin, the colt (No. 4), is from that lady's stepbrother, and is a bay, with what seems to carry everything before it all over England, and where Crafty is all but invincible. Robin is a five-year-old bay, under fourteen two, and, as the saying goes, "as good as he's brown." Mr. Hesketh's pair of grey Turkish Arabs quite bore the stamp of their nationality in their chili flesh, their arched necks and their high crests. They were fifteen hands high, and imported from Russia, and stepped capitally together in double harness, and would have made a cool thing of the "merry legs" order. Mr. Aysford's match ponies, No. 5, took the second prize in their class, and were very pretty and compact, and the judges made no mistake when they selected the dark chestnut Filly, a very good one (No. 5), for their prize as the pair stood fourteen hands. The victory of Polly (No. 10), was much enhanced by the fact that she was placed before Mr. Hirst's Cambridgeshire Miss Warren, one of the handsomest and best stepping ponies in Hunter's row. As usual, Mr. George Holman was "on the spot" with a very clever coaching set. Prince of Wales (No. 6) was one of the best mouthers we see at Howden and elsewhere, but with quality for every and at present no more than fifteen hands. Mr. Holman's pair came with a Pytchley character, and kept it against The Tyke, Sprig of Shillelagh, and a host of lesser lights. Mr. Hall's pair of fifteen sixteen one in height, but so well put together that he does not look so much. He was originally engineered for Lord Yarborough's off-fore, if not twine, at Tattersalls' before he fell into the hands of Earl Spencer, who is said to have refused 500 gs. for him.

THE FARM.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY'S SHOW AT PLYMOUTH.

The stock catalogue was thin for the Plymouth meeting of the present years, and the implement one seemed to have been studying "Source's Horse and Carpenchaun," as it and not Bell's Life was the "Farmer's" letter instance the happy change is said to have been effected by a strong charge per line, which has caused the descriptive author of the implements and machines most effectually to "cut it short" in the attack among which the sheriffcorn numbered 81; the Horsforth, 61; the Dervent, 57; Ransome and Sims, 37; Crosskill, 29; and Lord Stradbrook at one time intended to send his aged short horn bull Prince, who was reported to be "dead lame," but has changed his mind, and thus "Lord Chancellor," the prize bull at the Bath and West of England, and a very promising purchase at the late Mr. Jonas Webb's sale, was in higher look than his late namesake, and found a great foe in Cornish men, who were represented in force with its "Duke of Devonshire," defeated all the strangers in the two year-old class; and then Mr. Fawkes exercised his General Bequest and Lee Devereux's Princess, the second prize heifer at the late Exeter, by his celebrated bull Lord Coleham from Fatima. Last year he won the Queen's bull-pail prize with Lord Coleham, and names are quite coming back for the Farnley roans. Mr. Thomas Booth was second to the latter by yearling class with a very promising son of Valeo and Campdelmore, which gave 9 months 1 week sorry; and Sir J. G. Shuttleworth secured the third prize with a son of Captain Charry, a first-prize Worcester winner.

Mr. Cook's beautiful little cow Cherry came with a great clue ructer as the first cow at the Yorkshire show last year, and her owner found much prize-getting satisfaction in the Plymouth entry, which did over his Lord dolphus's at Battersea. Mr. Stratton's Dialus and Mr. Sharpe's Elegant were second and third in a strong class. Lady Egerton's Fortune was the reserve number. Mr. Cook's cow was by the Dobin spring winner, only commanded. Mr. T. Booth's Lady Pearson, which is at Mr. G. of Scarcroftie and the property of Mr. Stephen Wrigley to the fore in the heifer in-calf class, which was a very small one; but why Lady of Rondon should be put out of the prize list, and the yearling heifers Yorkshire and the north were conspicuous as Lord Feversham's Princess, the second prize heifer at the late Exeter to the top; and Captain Tennant's Miss Farewell, a first-prize heifer at Dublin Spring was in the same place. Mr. Stratton's Dialus was well, was at Worcester. One of Mr. Wood's "ad, little white" twins of his grand Cardigan stock took first honours, and love Et. Co. and Co. Co. free of which fell to Mr. Charles Howard's second with the lenets—Messrs. Druvery, Robinson, and Thompson—thought of them rising figure. Among the heifer calves Mr. Stratton's Dialus was the had far age in her favour, but she was on all points an easy first.

If Mr. Jackson was astonished at the Duke of Oxford's behind Mr. Reed's Colesborne and Mr. Rolling's Chieftain the Second, he had his revenge when in the female division the Duke of Oxford's speaker acknowledged no Chieftain the Third's sway in the two-year-old bull class, and his Royal Lord first for the Duke of Oxford's Lord Dalmain, who then he was a few weeks old, after a colt of the then Duke of Clarendon's Lavish was never thought to be a calf at all, and was wrong, as the son of Caster and old Carlisle has been as training a customer in showyards as his owner when he is hunting an inch of death or dishonour for the blue and buff, and the colours are black, white, and roan." Mr. Ransome's first-prize yearling bull went back to the same Cardigan blood as Mr. Cook's cow, and Messrs. Thompson and Mosdoe cress, on which Mr. Monkhouse, the patriarch of the Horsforth, hates his stand, was "in the pink" with his pair of two-year-old bull calves. This is the third year in succession that the Stow herd has taken a place, and it is to be hoped that it will not be long before Thomas cross begins to tell. The Lockington herd began to cross in the cow class, where Second Duchess and the Duke secured a first-prize heifer-in-calf class, where Miss Hastings 2nd took her third Royal first. In the same prize-takers in the yearling heifer class were highly commended, and Sailor had the winner in Marchioness of Exeter's Mary, from the Royal Flemish Farm, stood first among the calves, which included the daughters of Sailor, Lord Lovel, and Mr. Cook's cow.

Mr. James Quarly's name did not appear among the Devon entries. Mr. Davy, of Flitton, was second to Sobieski, in the old-bull class, with a son of Mr. Thompson gold medallist, Duke of Flitton; and the third cow, Constitution, like Sobieski, and Lord Falmouth's first-prize two-year-old bull, was bred by Mr. Thompson's blue blood. Mr. George Turner's Beating was the best yearling bull, and Mr. Taylor's Profit Duke, another son of the Battersea gold medallist, was first in the class for the calves. Davy, Taylor, and John Quarly was the order in an excellent cow class. General Hood and the Devon Queen grandson of Denmark take her third Royal first; and in the yearling and calf class Mr. Davy "took up the running," before his favourite shire phantom in such earnest with his Duke of Flitton's daughters that he found himself with two firsts and a second.

In the heifer classes there were just twelve entries, half of them belonging to the Brothers Heasman, who won £50 in prizes and headed every class. Sixty-one entries were thought from the Channel Islands; and the other established breeds were made up of eight Norfolk and Suffolk polls, two hogfarms, and a Kerry. Devon and South Hams were distinguished in the local prizes. The heifers are larger, taller, and rougher built than the North Devons generally of a pale red colour, and very noted millers; and the shop of the team ilk partake of the same peculiarities, and have large frames and coarse wool and bone.

The £100 blood-horse prize, which has fallen for the last four years to Sathourne, Elsington, Neville, and Laughing Stock, had only one claimant this summer in Morley, who won the hunter-sire prize, with one of "no merit" against him, at Newcastle last year. He has a great deal of the character of his sire Touchstone about him, and is a very useful country horse, as, although he is rather loaded about his shoulders, he has no lack of what is technically termed "quality." Cottager was the first hunter sire, but there was "no mistake" to claim the third prize, which was not the case in the hunter brood mares, as in the last landscape, although only three came. Tory Sydebiche, the best of them the Duke of Beaufort's, headed the old cart-horse class; and the Royal Home Farm was first in the two-year-old filly class with another of the same cart-horse kind by Lord Ducie's Lord Suffolk, then entered only nine of their "three-legged" chestnuts in four classes, and the best of the number was Mr. Hall's Dale Artaxerxes only sent two ponies, and Ransome etc. so that the "one-and-all prize" was not to be had, and the Lockington herd was left to ramble round the unhappy, had no echo on their mouth.

The yearling colt class was a good one, and Mr. Boston took the first steadying prize (with a new "Sunday man," Mr. Arthur Dabbs) with Lord Feversham's Prince, the first Royal heifer (No. 1, and the same middle place between his friend Mr. Stamper's and Colonel Towneley's two-year-olds, Lord Polamere, and Mr. Kingdon of Thorevers, were the only west country two-year-olds to appear in these classes. In the Cotswold classes Messrs. T. Walker, J. Gillett, and Mr. J. Brown were specially noticeable. Mr. Walker's Mr. T. B. Marshall (whose aged sun class was generally commended) and Mr. J. Lyon took every one of eight prizes. In Oxford Downs' shearlings Mr. G. Wallis was not in his "at form, as Mr. Bryan swept the board with his Lord Lovel pen, and Mr. Druce was not in a very short class of old rams. The Biddenham flock was also second and third with shearlings, and Mr. Druce's Lord Lovel 2nd was also a step since last year. There were forty-nine Southdown shearling rams in the yearling entries, and Lord Walsingham won first out of six, going and had to bow before the Goodwood pen of shearling ewes. The "Sheep" men were conspicuous as ever at their position, and made a very long entries, or never more than last year. Mr. Jonas Webb and Mr. J. Cowen then took first honours, whereas this year the latter did not enter, and Mr. Jonas Webb had a shearling ram for Colonel Dyott, while the Messrs. Crane were in their old place of 1861-63 with shearling ewes and lambs. Mr. Rigden's Duke of Cleveland, who is rather a coy shower, came out again with his dainty shearling ram, and Mr. Flower's Lord Lovel 2nd was in the yard, and the Horned Dorsets, those fruitful mothers of "horse-feeding" at a shilling a head, were in force, and Mr. Farquharson's Dorsets were entirely represented by the Hunstable and Ryge flocks of Messrs. Burgess and Sons, and the Cotswolds by the harmless heads, grey ram and long legs, and unfitting energies, were well represented by Messrs. Drew and Mayo, from the Tavistock neighbourhood; and the Exmoors, which have been in the Island Home Farm, had eight entries for their £25, of which Mr. E. Saunder got £20.

In "any other variety" Mr. Miller's "Perfect Cure," the winner of the middle box class last year, was first, under the new name of "Mr. Miller's Cure," and Mr. Jonas Webb's Lord Lovel 2nd was before he handed the dog in the Harrow counter and defied both frames and magistrates. Mr. Cowen's Lord Lovel 2nd was second in the bowl, bone and sow, Mr. Wainman was beaten by Mr. Duckering; and Mr. Jonas Webb's Lord Lovel 2nd was in the "any other variety" class, were the small whites with Blair Athol, of Mr. Waleman's breeding. What with Black Prince and Black Boss, and his small whites, Mr. Waleman's pigs were the most noticeable in the Royal Stables, as usual, something more than a pig-lecturer. Mr. Sexton took one of the first prizes for Mr. Jonas Webb's Lord Lovel 2nd, and met with his three Berkshire sows and his boar. The local prizes included the Royal Agricultural Society's Lord Lovel 2nd, and Mr. Sexton's gold cream butter, made and printed in pounds and half pounds; and the first prize of Mr. Jonas Webb's Lord Lovel 2nd.

The show partook more of the character of a monster local meeting than of the county one, and the country folk were in their mind to a large size, as compared with Newcastle, have no reason to complain. The rain was against them on Tuesday, and only 47½ persons paid at the doors; but on Wednesday the Prince and Princess of Wales, or rather, for the nonce, Duke and Duchess of Cornwall, were in the county, and 6,000 persons paid at the gate. Plymouth was so full that the Mayor politely notified that the hotel-keepers were not to be blamed if the Royal party in any detectives from different towns, that the "Barringtons" were at one of the hotels, and the commander of the French gunboat had brought over with him.

The trial of implements began under rather discouraging circumstances, as the judges and the heralds, according to a contemporary, are as follow —" Wood wins a prize of £10 for his grass-mower, £5 for his horse-rake, and £5 for his turnip-cutter. Ransome, Sims, and Head wins £5 for their grass-mowers. £8 for their combined horse-rake and turnip-cutter, and £5 for their turnip-cutter. Burgess and Key wins £5 for their horse-rake. £5 for their grass-mower; Pickney and Sims gain £5 for their two-horse mower; Crosskill takes £5 for his grass-mower; Hornsby £5 for his rake £5 for their one-horse reaper, and £15 for their self-delivery reaper. Burgess and Key's grass-mower is highly commended, and Mr. Cuthbert's one-horse reaper is "highly commended." Of the numerous prizes for drills and manure distributors, the largest sums go to Prince and Woodroffe, Hornsby, Sainty, Coultas, Reeves, and Gower."

Mr. M'Kenzie, of Glasgow, on Edinburgh standard, and Mr. Hall, of Dartford, on Kentish standard, are the judges for the ploughing.

The Ferne papers announce that three English gentlemen left Ushant yesterday for Brest, Messrs. Gordon, Watts, and the 16th inst. Their names are stated to be Lord Francis Douglas, the Rev. Mr. Hawker, and Mr. Watts.

A telegram from Magdeburg, in Prussia, reports a serious railway accident, caused by the breaking of a tire of a locomotive. Ten persons were killed, and many more injured.

The face of a large and handsome fountain has been uncovered at Pompeii. Connected with this very curious fact is given—namely, that the fountain is supplied with water by a leaden pipe, which has not been supposed heretofore to have been applied to any such purpose. It is conjectured that the water-supply was cut off by the falling of ashes, and that the inhabitants were thus forced to have recourse to other means.

For references to our illustration of the Royal Masonic Institution for boys at Wood-green, in the last Number, we are desired by Mr. Binckes to state that the Grand Secretary, and not the Grand Treasurer, and nonetheless, has been carried out by Mr. S. B. Wilson and himself, as the Institution's auditors, for a fourth year in succession, and has been first problem two years ago.

Mr. Gregory Lucas, a handsome life-boat, the gift of Mr. Henry Stinson, of Old Trafford, Manchester, was launched at Margport in the presence of a large concourse of spectators on Saturday last. The boat is intended for Mr. Stinson has paid down £40, with a promise of an annual subscription of £10 to maintain the boat in efficient order. Mr. Lucas is the inventor of the "self-righting" principle, and the Curtis and the Spicers are also self-righters. In consequence of heavy rolling sea, the Great Eastern was unable to communicate with the shore, and the passengers and mails were landed at Portland Bill, where she still lies, the descent of the cable in fathoms on the chart and under the superintendence of the National Telegraph Company. The cable for the Atlantic will be paid out in about a few days ago to the Trunk coast. Each boat is 23ft. long, rows ten oars, and is fitted with the usual equipments of the Royal National Institution.

The Great Eastern, laden with the Atlantic telegraph cable, left the Foreland, off Dover, on Saturday last, at half-past five o'clock in the morning. The Caroline, with the shore end of cable, twenty-seven miles in length, was stationed at Falmouth by her brother until Monday, and had to be taken in tow by the Great Eastern off Land's-end the same day, and taken to Valentia during a heavy sea. The Caroline and the Spitzen are also off Valentia. THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION PRIZE MEETING ON WIMBLEDON COMMON.

FIFTH DAY.

The Prince of Orange visited the camp yesterday week. His Royal Highness on his arrival was received by Earl Spencer and Lieutenant-Colonel Colville, in command of the camp, and by them he was conducted first to where they shot at the "running deer." Out of four shots which the Prince took at the deer, he made two bull's-eyes.

The Royal Highness subsequently, with a select party, visited the scene of the competition for the Horatio Ross prize, which proved to be a trial of skill between the Earl of Aberdeen and Mr. Peterkin, of Cambridge University, the former stating the result of the match between these two competitors, it is necessary to explain the conditions under which this prize is shot for. The rifle to be used in shooting is any muzzle-loader, double or single barrelled, to be loaded with powder from the hand. The charge is five drachms. The competitor to be at liberty to rifle as often as he wishes, and in order to carry off the prize he must make, at a distance of 200 yards, a score of 21 points with eleven shots, seven 4 points, being a bull's-eye for each shot, and the outside circle counting 1. His score may be made in as few or as many shots as he may choose to discharge the eleven shots is for single-barrels five minutes, and for double-barrels four minutes. The competitor comes loaded, not equipped with the firing-point, and at the word "commence," he runs up to the firing-point, and has to complete his operations with his rifle, ammunition, rod, and everything he makes use of in from a point a post fifty yards off; loading when he likes, but not copping until he arrives at the firing-point. The competitors are then allowed to make as many practice firing from sixty yards. The Earl of Aberdeen, having loaded, came to the firing-point, and commenced firing. Lieutenant Russell down in front of him, and, discharging his rifle, made a bull's-eye. Rising, he went through the same process, with a like result. He then ran fifty yards, loaded as he went along, and on coming to the firing-point he capped and fired, and again made a bull's-eye; but in the next two shots, making only centres, the noble Earl gave way to his competitor, Mr. Peterkin, of whom it is sufficient to say that within five minutes he discharged seven bull's-eyes and four centres, and thus won the prize, Lord Aberdeen representing a score of 11 points.

The chief event of the day was the 600 yards' shooting for the Queen's prize, which brought the first stage of the competition for this year to a close. The number of the contest was 200, and included H. Ross, of the London Scottish, carried off the silver medal, a Rigby rifle, and £10; Captain Dalgety, of the Captain Holme 4th of the Somerset, tied him, but Mr. Ross's performance at the first stage of 109 sent him through to the final of Captain Wilkinson, who also was decided in favour of the former. In this stage eight others scored 4's each; five, 4's, nine, 3's; ten, 2's; thirteen, 1's; thirty-four, 0's; and twenty-nine, twenty-nine wasted their entire rifle, the N.R.A. badge, and 5s each; the next thirty won the N.R.A badge and 5s each; and the remaining forty won 5s each.

SIXTH DAY.

Saturday last was an important day on account of the valuable prizes offered, and also on account of the number of visitors.

Amongst the most interesting matches of the day was that for the Cobham cup, which proved to be shot for by the men of each county which chose to compete, and to be held as a challenge cup by the Lord Lieutenant of the county winning it twice, or three times in the volley-firing match for the prize given by the South-Western Railway Company to the various corps, as it was last year.

For the China challenge cup thirty-two counties, including London and Edinburgh, entered. The cup was won by Gloucestershire, who declared the winners of the vase, to which was appended £50 in money; Lanarkshire being second, and winners of £25; Suffolk third, winning £15; and Middlesex fourth, winning £10.

For the prizes of the London and South-Western Railway volley-firing at 200 yards, thirty-two corps entered their names to be shot in the contest. Lanarkshire were the winners of the first prize of £50; the first battalion of Middlesex, second, with £25; and the second battalion of Middlesex, the third prize of £10.

The first contest for the Canada prizes at 200 yards, five shots each, was completed; the winner of the highest prize, £25, being Sergeant Ross, of Perth, with a score of 23 points. Three rose from Drane being second and Sergeant Butler third for the two £20 prizes, Sergeant Ross, of Perth, with a score of 23 points, and Private Wall, 18 each. There were seventy other winners in this competition.—The five of 24 each, sixteen of 23 each, twenty of 22 each, and twenty-nine of 21 each.

For the Alexander first stage, at 500 yards, the highest score made was 19, by Mr. Ross, of the London Scottish. Lanarkshire followed with 20 being the highest possible score with five rounds each. There were forty-three first-stage prizes, twenty-seven winners, and fourteen. The winner of the Enfield Association cup is Lieutenant F. H. Dickins, of the Victoria and Inns of Court, who made 24 points. For their Lieutenant Engraving of which we give) Corporal Little, of the West Middlesex.

For the Army Rifle Association cup the highest score made was by Private Ramsay, of the Lanarkshire.

For Mr. Barry's prizes the winner of the highest, £10, was Private J. M. May, 1st Somerset. There were two others, with the same score, of 24 points each, but one man was beaten on the card; making the total of £50.

In the afternoon Mr. Gale went through some experiments on the common to show that gunpowder might be rendered incombustible by the admixture of certain substances. A blast was accomplished by lighted fuses being thrown amongst it and no ignition taking place, but on the gunpowder being exposed to a high-pressure heated steam jet, gunpowder was immediately exploded. In one instance a red-hot poker was inserted, without effect, into the mass.

SUNDAY.

Divine service was performed, on Sunday morning, in the bell tent, opposite the shooting butts for the Queen's prize, by the Volunteer in camp. The tent was decorated with flags of different nations. The band of the Coldstream Guards, under the direction of Mr. Dolmetsch, attended and accompanied the service with some excellent music. At eleven o'clock the Grenadier Guards marched in, followed by the police; and shortly after twelve the Victoria, the Inns of Court, the Brigade, the 1st Surrey, and then followed the country volunteers, amounting altogether to about 1,000 in number. Mr Lochrin took his text from the 17th chapter of the Gospel according to St. John, and preached from the top of the shoulder tent. Most of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from evil."

In the afternoon Divine service was again celebrated by the Rev. W. H. Haygarth, Incumbent of Wimbledon.

SEVENTH DAY.

The two most interesting events of Monday were those for the dragon cup, restricted to the sixty best shots in the first stage of the competition, and the Elcho challenge shield and the "Ashburton" challenge cup, value £100, restricted to winners of prizes of the value of £5 and upwards in the "rifle" competitions at Wimbledon in previous years. The dragon cup was carried off by Private J. Hamerton, 5th Middlesex, of North Hornsby Road, 9th Lancashire, took the Wimbledon cup, justly accounted one of the principal prizes of the meeting, with a score of 8 points, at the 600 and 1000 yards range. Private Grundie made 47 marks.

The second stage of the Alexander prize was won by Sergeant Kerr, of the Lanarkshire.

There was some excellent shooting at the running deer, and Lieutenant Hurst, of the 2nd Flintshire, succeeded in making eight bull's-eyes, besides several centres.

The meeting for the first stage of the Albert prize was proceeded with till gun fire, but all the rounds were not disposed of.

EIGHTH DAY.

Tuesday was the most important day in the proceedings, as it was the one which was to decide who, out of more than 2000 competitors, was to become the possessor of the Queen's prize of £250 and the gold medal of the association, besides being for the next twelve months the hero of the united body of marksmen of England and Scotland. Great expectations had been formed of the powers of Mr. Edward Ross, from the excellent shooting he had made in the first stage, when he gained the silver medal of the association and money prizes. The contest began with sixty competitors at the first range of 800 yards; but even here the good fortune of Mr. Ross was not equal to former times, for his total score was 50, Sergeant Churchill of the 1st London, making 59; Corporal Seale, 3rd Somerset, making 72; and Ensign Norcombe, of the 1st Devon, making a similar number. The next range was at 900 yards, at which Private Deare, of the Victoria, made a high score, 29 points; while Mr. Edward Ross made only 14. Sergeant Ingram, 1st Lanarkshire, who shot in the same squad, made 29; and Corporal Walker, 1st Hampshire, 31; while Private Seale, of the 6th West York (Halifax), made 25 points. Earl Spencer made 23. There were seven squads made up from those who made this range, and were removed to the extreme part of the common at the 1000 yards. The squad which contained Mr. E. Ross also contained Private Deare, who had been in the first stage for the silver medal, and Corporal Ferguson, 1st Inverness (Queen's Own) Artillery Volunteers. In another squad was Earl Spencer, 1st Northamptonshire, where total score was 35, but the next highest score to the winner was made by Ensign Hinds, 22nd Middlesex (London Westminster), who made 59 points; Private Deare, Victoria, 58; Sergeant Little, 3rd Gloucestershire, 57; and Private Bennett, 11th Middlesex, 57. The competitors were then formed into four squads, and on its becoming known that Private Sharman, 6th West Yorkshire, had made 64 points at the conclusion of the shooting for this squad, some of his companions mounted him upon their shoulders and carried him away in triumph. In that engagement no less a notice was issued from the statistical tent declaring Mr. Sharman to be the winner. This was the first intimation received that the winner was again recorded on men's shoulders, and he received a complete ovation on his way to the Victoria Gate, where cheers and hearty were the congratulations of the winner. This finished the contest for the Queen's prize for 1865, and it is only right to observe that although there is no material difference between the total score by which it was gained last year, yet on the whole average shooting there is a very great improvement observable.

The other competitions consisted of the first stage of the Albert prize, Earl Spencer's prize, and Alderman Copeland's prize, and the shot for by breech-loaders, extra prizes, the navy rifle association cup, the Richmond cup prize, and the Victoria association challenge shield.

The day again the Earl of Aberdeen made some excellent shooting for Captain Kiou's prize, making 46 points and running one hundred yards away, and also, all in five minutes, for the Victoria, from Cambridge University, made 44 points within the same time.

SIXTH DAY.

The principal contest on Wednesday was for the Chancellor's challenge plate. This is presented by the Duke of Devonshire, K.G., for annual competition among the Queen's Westminster Rifle Volunteers. For the last year or two Cambridge has easily carried off this trophy; but last year the challenge was won outright by a team of Cambridge's best men, Mr. E. Ross and Mr. Doe, did not figure in the contest. And this surmise proved correct, Oxford having taken up the plate.

The second stage of the Albert prize was also shot off. This is a prize of £100, given for competition by members who win first stage; the distances are 800, 900, and 1000 yards; seven shots at each range. This is a very difficult competition to win, and is generally competed for by all the best marksmen at the meeting. Mr. Ross, the winning man, was not present, but Mr. Deare, when the prize was won by Mr. Hercules Ross with a total score of 72 points. The distances were then given to each competitor by Assistant Surgeon Henderson, of Midlothian, but his fore-sight was objected to on the ground of its being one of the front aperture sights, the use of which is debated. The objection, however, was not upheld, and Deare, Private Baker, of Bristol, scored only one mark less than Mr. Henderson.

Amongst the other prizes shot for were Earl De Grey and Ripon's, the winner of the last year being Lieutenant Colonel Fenwick, 1st Durham; the five-groove rifles prize, the £10 prize being won by Corporal Chilcott, 1st Kent, Eight Home; the Queen's prize (which was given as Regarding last week), won by Sergeant Holland, Victorian and the Enfield Volunteer cup, won by Private Deare.

The prize will not be distributed at the Crystal Palace this year. They will be given to the successful competitors at Wimbledon on Saturday (to-day) and the meeting will be brought to a close by a review of several of the volunteer corps by the Duke of Cambridge. The force to be engaged will number twenty-eight guns and 12,000 infantry; the volunteer corps of cavalry will not probably be represented. The general orders issued state that the force is to assemble on the ground, near Richmond Gate, at 10 a.m., the manœuvring to commence at five p.m. Any corps which does not reach the place of assembly until after the time by which it belongs has marched off must necessarily be debarred from taking part in the manœuvres until towards the close of the review.

MUSIC.

The "London musical season" has nearly reached its conclusion. The last operatic novelty of the season, the long looked-for "Africaine," is to be produced at Covent-garden on Saturday next, and it is announced that the Royal Italian Opera will positively close on Saturday week. Her Majesty's Theatre has been closed since, and will be nothing new, and that Wagner's "Tannhauser," after all, is not to be given.

Mdlle. Dina de Murska, whose appearances at Her Majesty's Theatre this season have been so brilliantly successful, has returned to Vienna. Mr. Lucas has also taken his departure for Berlin, to the concluding performances of the "Flauto Magico" Mdlle. du Mouchy has been replaced by Miss Laura Harris, and Dr. Gunz by Signor Gardoni.

Mdme. Parepa is on the eve of her departure for America, on a professional tour under the auspices of Mr. Gye.

Mr. Edward Murray has been appointed manager of the Royal English Opera, Covent-garden.

The first thirty performances of the "Africaine" at Paris produced a receipt of 346,000 francs (nearly £14,000 sterling), averaging 11,533 francs (£461 sterling) nightly—a success, we believe, unprecedented.

THE THEATRES.

There is not much change in the arrangements of the different houses this week. The season at the Haymarket closed, on Wednesday last, with "Seven Weeks After Marriage," "Brother Sam," the operetta of "The Miller's Daughter," and a farce. The house, as usual, delivered by Mr. Buckstone. On Friday Miss Amy Sedgwick had an evening for a special performance, including "Comfits and Countess" and "The Lady of Lyons." Mr. Walter Montgomery's tragic engagement on the 17th inst. There is some talk of Mr. Buncicault shortly taking a holiday, and passing it on the other side of the Atlantic, in the hope of recruiting the state of her principal characters. The St. James's has closed for the season. The New Royalty is now under the management of Mr. Mowbray, and on Monday Miss Neilson appeared as Juliet in Shakespeare's play of "Romeo and Juliet." The cast was strong, comprising Mr. H. Marston as the Nurse, Mr. Ryder in the Friar, and Mr. Addison as Capulet. At the Prince of Wales's, a new occasional farce, by Messrs. W. Brough and A. Halliday, has been produced, entitled "The Marlborough Election." These gentlemen have now so frequently supplied these hasty pieces that the public is pretty well certified of their general merits. The present fully sustains the reputation of the authors. Its interest gathers round a new waiter at a country hotel, in election time. Unfortunately for the interest of the landlord, there is no excitement, and to produce it he seeks to start a new candidate. He therefore disguises his new waiter, gives him another name, and puts him forward. For awhile the ruse succeeds, until one widow Wildduck recognises him. The aspiring waiter is personated by Mr. Harry Cox, and the persevering widow by Miss Lavine. Miss Adah Isaacs Menken took her benefit on Tuesday, at Astley's, and appeared as William in "Black-Eyed Susan." She proceeds, it is said, to France and New York, and has advertised her equipage for sale.

We have received a report of the progress of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean in St. Louis, where their reception appears to have been prodigious. On the 23rd of June Mr. Kean addressed the audience, promising to revisit them in November. On the 27th they appeared in "Henry VIII." and "The Jealous Wife," at the theatre in Chicago, which was filled in every part. The tragedian of "Hamlet" and "Louis XI." have also been performed with éclat. Altogether, they may be congratulated on their success.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Marquis of Westminster has given £50 in aid of the fund of the Metropolitan Convalescent Institution, Covent-garden.

On Monday morning Archbishop Manning laid the foundation-stone of a new church for the Carmelite Order at Kensington. It will be dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen, and will be built in the Gothic style.

The governors of St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, have resolved to erect a new wing to the hospital in the neighbourhood. In accordance with the donor's directions, the money is to be at once invested for the permanent benefit of the charity.

The annual presentation of rewards by the Royal Society for the Protection of Life from Fire to persons who have rescued life from fire during the past twelve months took place, on Thursday week, in the Egyptian Hall, Mansion-house, the Lord Mayor presiding over the meeting.

Many gentlemen of Cumberland, or connected therewith, the Earl of Lonsdale, K.G., presiding, have attended and presented a handsome service of plate to Mr. John Dixon, the late secretary of the Cumberland and Westmoreland Society for the Encouragement of Agriculture, Arts, and Manufactures, in recognition of his long and great services in promoting the interests of the society for half a century.

There has been a mule and donkey show this week at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, which appears to have been very successful, having since been admitted to compete for prizes. The object of the show is to encourage the breeding of mules and donkeys for the use of agriculturists and the army. Accordingly, the Bishops of London and Oxford, Miss Burdett Coutts, and the Secretary for War, have been among the visitors to the show, which closed on Saturday night.

Signs of the termination of the London season present themselves in the closing days of the various exhibitions. The Royal Academy will close on the 15th inst., and the number of visitors to the rooms in Trafalgar-square during the present week has been very large. It is understood that the council of the Royal Academy have resolved to recommend the foundation-stone of the new National Gallery, which is to be erected on the site of the present Royal Academy, will be a stately edifice, rearranging in its general features and style of architecture the new Government offices in Downing-street, and the ornamentation and in some respects in the mode of construction. It will to be of Portland stone, and will be fireproof. The estimated cost is £150,000, or £10,000 less than that of Westminster Bridge.

The annual dinner of the Royal Academy Members of the Newspaper Press Fund was held last Saturday, at the Freemasons' Tavern—Mr. S. C. Hall, one of the vice-presidents, occupying the chair. The subscriptions, as in every preceding meeting of the kind, exceeded the report, from which it appears that the fund has been the means of relief to 1,000 persons, of whom 400 received £10 annual members. Of the 132 members, 120 belong to the London press, and 12 to the provincial press. Of the 1,000 persons who have received relief from the fund, 400 were widows of members. At the death, the widows of two of whom have received assistance from the fund, the committee have been able to grant a pension of £50 per annum, and have required at the last annual dinner. The society now has £1500 stock in the New Three per cent. Consols, and a balance in hand of £1,000 at the bankers, at the end of the year, a balance of £193. The income of the society at the principal sources, £1,000 from annual subscriptions, £1,000 from donations, £500 annual subscriptions of members, £150 annual donations, £120 annual subscriptions of honorary members, and £100 from life subscriptions. It is agreed to making the secretary a paid officer; and another resolution was passed to increase the number of members to 150 in all.

In London the births of 1926 children—981 boys and 945 girls—were registered in the week ending last Saturday. In the 10 corresponding weeks of ten years, 1855-64, the average number, corrected for increase of population, was 1,844. The number registered in the week was 916. It was the twenty-ninth week of the year, and the deaths of 1,222 persons in the week were 1,222 below the average number of corresponding weeks in the last ten years. The deaths registered in the week were 1,222 below the average number of corresponding weeks in the last ten years. The deaths registered in the previous week to 30 last week. Deaths at all ages from diarrhœa decreased in the same period from 97 to 68, and from cholera from 48 deaths to 24 deaths. In few exceptions, cases of infantile diarrhœa.—Last week the births in London and ten other large towns of which the Registrar-General receives returns 2878. The annual rate of mortality in the week in these eleven towns was 20 per 1000. "WHITEFIELD PREACHING IN MOORFIELDS, A.D. 1742."

AMONG our youngest painters of historical genre Mr. Crowe has taken a distinguished place, by virtue of a series of well-composed, carefully-studied, and soundly-painted pictures which have been exhibited within the last few years at the Royal Academy. Of these, the most recent and important have been "De Foe in the Pillory," "The Scene in Brick-court, Temple, After Goldsmith's Death," "Luther Posting His Theses on the Church Door of Wittenburg," and the large and elaborate picture we now engrave. To the title of this picture in the Royal Academy catalogue the artist appends the following quotation from Philip Doddridge's Rise and Times of Whitefield:—"The merry-making attended by others, who complained that they had taken many pounds less that day on account of my preaching, got up, and, with a few shoulders; and advancing, attempted to clash me with a long heavy whip several times, but always, with the utmost fair motion, tumbled the clown. Other and a recruiting-sergeant with his drum to pass through the congregation. . . . Others, having got a large pole for their standard, advanced from the opposite side with steady and formidable steps; but just as they approached us they quarrelled among themselves, threw down their staff, and went their way. . . . My pockets were full of notes from persons brought under concern. Boys and girls were found all sitting round me while I preached handed me those people's notes, though often pushed by eager, dirt, &c., and they never once gave way."

The picture so closely illustrates this passage that to offer further merely descriptive remarks would be entirely supererogatory. All the incidents of the quotation are given, or suggested as likely to follow, together with some others which the reader cannot fail to observe for himself. We may add, however, that Whitefield says that the scene described in the quotation occurred on a Whit Monday. For many years, from one side of Moorfields to the other, hundreds of tall booths been erected for mountebanks, players, puppet-shows, and such like." At such a resort for amusement the concourse on the most popular holiday of the year would, of course, be enormous. Whitefield estimates that there could not have been less than twenty or thirty thousand people present. Three times did he preach to them during the day, the incidents of the picture occurring during the third service in the evening. To his success at Moorfields Whitefield attributes the beginning of the "Tabernacle Society." Our readers are aware that the Tabernacle, in Tottenham-court-road, still exists and prospers. It will be remembered, too, that the Moorfields district was often the scene of the missionary labours of Whitefield's contemporary revivalist Wesley, that similar persecution from the mob attended his preaching, and that with more permanent and wider spread results have followed his ministry. These two remarkable men began their apostolic labours in concert, but disagreed on certain points, Whitefield adopting Calvinism and Wesley Arminianism. It is hard for us, now that London has extended miles beyond the site of Moorfields, to realise that the scene here represented actually took place only about a century ago, in that time. However, Moorfields had begun to be built upon. Very shortly after the Great Fire of 1666, when half London took refuge in Moorfields, many two-storied tenements were, according to Pepys, run up. In Whitefield's time the somewhat earlier the place is often mentioned in English literature as having consolidated into solid streets under the trees. But in the sixteenth century it was an undrained moor or fen, and a famous place of shooting when frosts were over in the winter. The site of Moorfields has been almost lost in Finsbury, or, as it was called, Fensbury.

On looking at our Engraving of Mr. Crowe's very interesting picture the reader will naturally reflect on the great events produced by Wesley and Whitefield, and the question may as naturally arise, should not similar means be adopted for reaching the ears and consciences of the tens of thousands who are nominally unchristianised than were the Moorfields audiences of a century back. But, before answering this question, we must remember the constitution of society are in many respects altered; that there are many channels of communication with the masses besides preaching which Wesley did not exist in the days of Wesley and Whitefield; and that the Established Church has undergone a very considerable change since that period—a reformation which may in part be fairly traced to the influence and example of those excellent men. But for the consideration of the authority has, for very wise reasons, forbidden indiscriminate preaching in the open air. Who that loves the Church of Christ can wish to see "decently and in order" has not been shocked at the indecent, disorderly behaviour and gross forms of bigotry and disfellowshipping often exhibited by open-air preachers a few years since? Moreover, if open-air preaching is to be permitted, how are we to prevent, without violating the first principles of religious liberty, the heterodox, the Mormonite, the infidel, even the atheist, from indulging proselytes in our very streets and highways? How indeed, unless—arrogating a prerogative which even the Almighty does not use—one fallible body of men attempt to coerce the consciences of another body of men not more fallible than themselves? Persecution of this sort, against whomsoever directed, is not only one of the worst of social crimes and diametrically opposed to the spirit of true Christianity, but is to be condemned even on the low ground of policy; for nothing defeats itself sooner or later—as, indeed, this picture tends to show us—to surely as persecution on account of opinion.

THE LAST DAYS OF THE CONFEDERATE GOVERNMENT.

THOUGH published at a somewhat late period, the series of four Illustrations which we give this week cannot fail to prove of much interest to our readers. It must be taken into consideration that our Special Artist at the head-quarters of the Southern army had numerous difficulties to contend with in the transmission of his correspondence to this Journal, and it is only now that, by his arrival in safety, we are placed in a position to avail ourselves of the last of his experiences in the Southern States of America.

After the capitulation of General Johnston there was virtually no armed force left east of the Mississippi; and President Davis, already a fugitive from Richmond, having been driven from the capital of Virginia by the surrender of General Lee, found himself again a wanderer by the wayside, seeking some means of escape from the Federal columns which were closing upon him in all directions. Our Special Artist, as we have already stated, accompanied Mr. Davis in his flight with the forty-eight hours' of his capture. A few of the sketches he made, while following the ex-President, are now given to the public.

One of these Illustrations shows the ex-President's train crossing the Pe-Dee River, in North Carolina. This was a long and tedious operation. There are several fords over the swift-running watercourses in this part of America, and very frequently no fords. Each waggon, with its horses and mules, had in this instance to be ferried across, separately, and this delay, with an enemy following in the rear, was, to say the least of it, very annoying. In fact, more than one alarm of the approach of the Federal cavalry was given before half the train had crossed the river, and the excitement amongst the waggoners and teamsters was excessive. The horses of the cavalry escort were made to swim the stream, being stripped of their saddles and their riders of most of their clothes. The confusion at the landing-place was enormous; a party of the frightened animals were scarcely in the water before they threw their riders and struggled to the bank, charging through a crowd of straggling cavalrymen. Notwithstanding all this, the entire train passed safely over the Pe-Dee and many other streams while our Artist was in its company, and the only misfortune that happened to him was two or three good duckings.

Another Illustration shows Mr. Davis and his Cabinet halting by the roadside; the ex-President engaged in signing papers which Mr. Benjamin, his Secretary of State, is handing to him. This was probably the last official business transacted by the Confederate Cabinet, and may well be termed "Government by the roadside." Our readers must bear in mind that at any moment the alarm might be given of the enemy's advance, and, to say the least, such a conditions of matters was scarcely calculated to give calmness to the deliberations of the fugitive Government.

The subject of another Illustration is the scene presented by a sudden chaos, or stampede, which was a very frequent occurrence, owing to the proximity of the Federal cavalry, who were frequently within three miles of the camp of the flying President. A scout had only to dash in and give the alarm when everything went helter-skelter along the road—President, Ministers, cavalrymen, four-mules waggons, and terrified negro servants, all jumbled up together.

The last of these Illustrations shows the farewell of Mr. Davis to his escort and staff in the square of Washington, Georgia. It was here that he determined to continue his flight almost alone; and assembling those round him who had sacrificed everything to the defeated cause, he, with tears in his eyes, begged them to seek their own safety and leave him to meet his fate. Undoubtedly, it was an ill-advised arrangement which brought an escort of 1500 men in the train of a man fleeing for his life; and, when too late, Mr. Davis saw the error of thus attracting the attentions of the entire country through which he passed, and disbanded them but forty-eight hours before his capture.

SCHOONER PRIZE OF THE ROYAL MERSEY YACHT CLUB.

At the meeting of the Royal Mersey Yacht Club, three weeks ago, the prize of the match for schooners and yawls was won by the Speranza, yawl, 100 tons burden, owned by Mr. R. B. Jones, Vice-Commodore of the club. We give an Illustration of the design of the handsome vase, costing £75, which formed the prize on this occasion. It was manufactured by Messrs. Wordley and Co., of Liverpool, as were also the silver tea-service and salver, which formed the ladies' prize.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH PRIZE SHOT FOR AT WIMBLEDON.

THE accompanying Illustration represents the prize given by the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph, value fifty guineas, and which has been won by Corporal Little, of the West Middlesex. This cup, manufactured by Mr. Benson, of Ludgate-hill, is vase-shaped, with chased designs in the centre from the antique. The cover of the cup is surmounted by a rifleman standing, "order arms;" and the handles are two angels, holding victorious wreaths, in frosted silver; the whole being remarkable for the chasteness and elegance of the design.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Astra Castra. By Hatton Turner. (Chapman and Hall.) A singular title (borrowed from the motto of the Lindsays), is, for once, in these days of deceptive epigraph, most harbinger of a singularly good book. The volume is not only of stupendous size, containing a vast number of coincidences and wonderful speculations, but is also remarkable for style; but it is remarkable for its subject, and for the specimens with which it is copiously embellished by photolithography. The subject is aerostation, or aerostatics, or ballooning, or by whatever term it is proper to describe that science which has for its object the rears and vavasors —for Montgolfier exhibited his first balloon in 1783—engaged the attention of inventive men, been lauded and ridiculed, extolled and caricatured, caused the thoughtful to ponder and unsettled or frightened the gaping crowd, had its enthusiasts, its detractors, and its victims. Whether aerostation will be, as some day predicted by a future generation as men now study statics and hydrostatics; whether our grand-grandchildren will sail with the eagle through the air, float over the very battle-ground of the elements, see the actual collision of clouds, watch the instant flash of the lightning and hear the concomitant rattle of the thunder upon the spot with no more concern than we now enjoy over the iron roads and mark the elemental strife from a distance; and whether airman will hereafter be as common a term as seaman is now, a prudent man would be loth to declare with confidence. It cannot be denied, however, that from Montgolfier to Coxwell is a great advance, and that there are a few names in the distance of prominence, perhaps, with "the good time coming," when the heavens will be daily thick with "aerial navigators after pattern" dropping down with costly bales." It is to our author's credit that he has trusted his subject with great modesty. He commences with a comparison between the dawn of navigation and the dawn of aerostation; he proceeds to treat of aerostation as it is theoretical, as it is, what has been called the "normal clairvoyance" of poets, so that the names of Phaethon, Daedalus, and Icarus, and of later poets or less mythical personages, together with long poetical extracts relating to these personages, are introduced into his pages; then comes a chapter dedicated to the early aeronauts, Montgolfier and Charles, to the deeds of many famous aeronauts, including Lunardi, and to the voyage of Blanchard and Jeffries across the channel; then follows an account of ascents of interest till 1800, preceded by a narrative of the adventures which led to the gallant Flitzer de Rozier's fate. The fifth chapter is devoted to "remarkable ascents from 1800 to 1825, including Napoleon's ascent at Boulogne, and an allusion to the balloon which was sent up at Napoleon's coronation, and within a few hours fell in the Mediterranean;" the sixth chapter to "other and notable "remarkable ascents from 1825 to 1840;" the seventh chapter treats of "remarkable ascents from 1840 to 1864," including the perilous ascent in July, 1847, undertaken by the late Mr. Albert Smith in this Journal; the eighth contains remarks upon war-balloons, from the time of the French revolution to the late civil war in America; the ninth chapter is occupied with a consideration of the "methods of directing balloons;" the tenth chapter, a particularly interesting one, is headed "feelings experienced in aerial travelling in calm and storm;" the eleventh chapter bears the title "caricatures and the ridicule this science has undergone;" and the twelfth chapter, superscribed "Conclusion," reviews of the past and the hopes for the future," besides pointing out many grounds of encouragement for those who believe in aerostation, contains a long quotation (the "cygnine song") from Victor Hugo's "Legende des Siecles." The appendix, in which there is much that is remarkable, interesting, useful, and amusing, is also remarkable for quite the reverse (object of the biblical references), and the indices make up a very well-compiled, instructive, and entertaining book. Speaking volume, the author's book needs no apology; but, if it did, his own words are sufficient :—"Beyond the evidence of facts, I do not claim for my statements on general synopsis of the science of aerostation has hitherto been published in England." Mr. Mason's brief account is good; yet the number of English ascents and savonauts more than doubles those of the French, who have left us numerous records. Let us, now remark, "they do these things better in France."

War Dress and Undress. By the author of "My Farm at Edgewood." (Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.) To all who have any agricultural or pastoral sympathies, and are not too professional or ignorant to be literary, when circumstances prevent them from being at-field, this book is welcome. The papers on "Grinpether Rife Corps"—the most amusing papers, perhaps, of the whole series—certainly, if memory be worth anything to a reader, appeared in that periodical; and the dedication of the book leads one to infer that the whole had the advantage of the same means of publicity. The writings rather as a reporter than as an essayist or a humourist; he no doubt saw and experienced all he professes to have seen and experienced, and his pleasantness is the expression of his extreme accuracy; he is, therefore, likely to find readers amongst those who like facts unembellished by any of the graces of style, and valuable precisely by any particular salt of wit or satire.

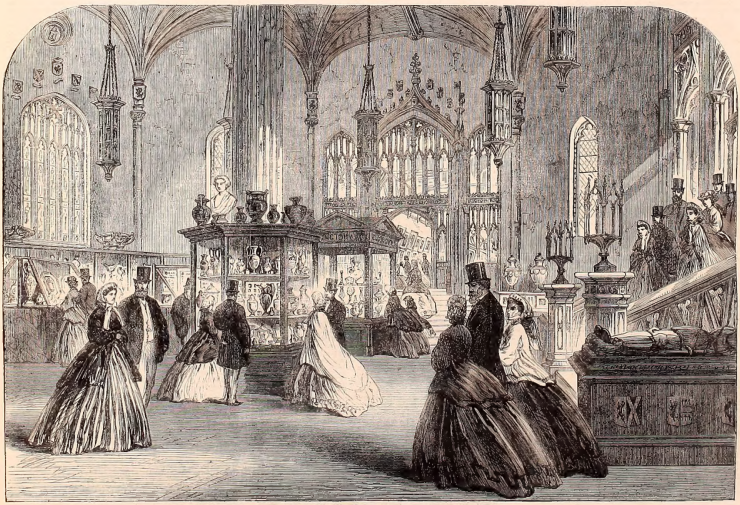
Ida Craigie; or, The Voice of God in a Dream. By Arthur Montgomery. (E. Marlborough and Co.) An odd jumble of religion, sheol-mentals, legacy, inheritance, and all kinds of heroics. And yet the book is dreary withal, and it is not without much yawning and skipping that we arrive at page 38, and reads, "Last night I fell asleep, and, behold! it was as it were the sleep of death"—and death is not terrible enough for any agonies which appeared to overcome in so horrible a form that any agonies of total annihilation," &c. These about to close. "Ida Clifford, who ends her address thus:"—As truly as there is a heaven, so truly did he speak to me in a vision. A Divine power alone could breathe into me a new life, and that life is in Jesus." Having arrived thus far, and obtained a clue to the meaning of the title, the reader will require some inducement beyond mere curiosity to carry him on to the end.

The Land of Israel. By H. B. Tristram, M.A., F.L.S., &c. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.) This handsome volume does honour to the source of its publication. It is "a journal of travels in Palestine, undertaken with special reference to its physical character," as Captain Wilson has strikingly illustrated; and, though it comes It is portioned and strikingly illustrated; and, though it comes after Mr. Hepworth Dixon's "Holy Land," the two books are so different in scope and style that they are not likely to clash.

Speeches and Addresses chiefly on the subject of British America Union. By Thomas D'Arcy M'Gee, M.P.P. (Chapman and Hall.) Mr. Darcy M'Gee's name has lately been a great deal before the public in connection with sentiments remarkable for sound sense, discrimination, and enlightenment. It is probable, therefore, that a collection of his speeches and addresses will be received with favour.

The County of Surrey. (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin.) One of "Cassell's Topographical Guides." It is a neat, handy, useful little volume, to be recommended at this time of the year to tourists and holiday-makers who are not acquainted with the merits of one of our most picturesque counties and who do not decline to be invigorated by any hot foreign breezes.

A letter from Vienna states that a fine piece of carpeting, measuring 14 ft. by 20 ft., the first of the kind manufactured in Austria, has just been placed in the museum of that city. It presents a map of the railways of Central Europe, and was produced at Prague.



ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

On the evening of the defeat of Mr. Gladstone Oxford did not present the very ordinary aspect. Whether the earth did on the eve of the Deluge, as John Martin has supposed it did, present somewhat unusually lively and excitedly strings; or whether the sea went abnormally lively and excitedly strings; or whether the sea went abnormally lovely and calmly down, bathing the gathering clouds with its rosy quietly and calmly down, bathing the gathering clouds with its rosy quietly and calmly down, bathing the gathering clouds with its rosy light, as it did and has done since the Creation, is a point which even the author of the "Vestiges" cannot now determine. Perhaps, like the author of the "Vestiges" cannot now determine. Perhaps, like the author of the "Vestiges" cannot now determine. Perhaps, like

THE NEW CHURCH OF ST. STEPHEN, CARLISLE, BUILT BY MISS BURDETT COUTTS.

THE NEW WESLEYAN CHAPEL, AT ASTON VILLA, LOZELLS, BIRMINGHAM.

NEW WESLEYAN CHAPEL AT BIRMINGHAM.

THE Wesleyan Methodists of Birmingham have lately built themselves a new place of worship at Aston Villa, in Lozells, a suburb of that town. It was opened on the last day of May, with special services for the occasion, and there was a festive repast in the adjoining school-room. We give an Illustration of the new building, which has cost £4000. Its foundation-stone was laid by Mr. Naish, a member of the Town Council, in April last year. Mr. J. G. Bland was the architect employed. This is the second new chapel which has been opened at Birmingham within the last six months by the same active and zealous religious body.

THE NEW CHURCH OF ST. STEPHEN, CARLISLE.

Our Illustration represents the new church erected by Miss Burdett Coutts, at her sole cost and charge, in the Citadel Station district of the town of Carlisle. That benefident lady is in no way connected with the town, either by family ties or by the possession of property situated there; but she volunteered to perform this good work in consequence of the representations made to her by Bishop Waldegrave as to the spiritual destitution of his diocese. The foundation-stone was laid by Miss Coutts herself, in March, 1864, and the finished building was opened and consecrated at the end of last May. The total cost amounts to £5000. The exterior presents an agreeable contrast of colour, by the judicious use of red and white stone. The general style of architecture is geometric Gothic. The entire length of the building is 110 ft., and its breadth, including the two wings, is 62 ft. The height from the ground to the ridge is 48 ft.; the height to the top of the wings being 28 ft., and above these runs a clerestory. The most striking feature is the square tower at the James-street end, from the top of which an octagonal spire rises in graceful proportions, terminating in a gilt cross. At each corner of the square tower there is a buttress, that at one corner containing the staircase to the belfry. The tower is finished by a cornice 3 ft. deep, from which the spire springs, and is a distance of a few feet, and then gradually tapered, its apex being 130 ft. from the ground. There are two entrances to the church on each side of the tower, and a single-light window filled with tracery on four sides of the spire, projecting from it about 2 ft., and is also decked with white and finished in what is technically called a finial. On the east side of the tower there is a door opening into the vestry-room. The east end of the church terminates in an apse, of polygonal form, the apex of which finishes in a light gilt cross, of a similar design. In it are three two-light windows, adorned with tracery, which Miss Coutts intends to fill with stained glass. On the south side of the building there are five two-light windows, finished as before described. Here, too, is the entrance to the west end of the church, and should a gallery be added at some future day, that will be the entrance to it. There will be used as the entrance for the children attending the schools, and to any disturbance to the congregation will be avoided. To the west end of the church has been left flat, as the schools which are to be built will come within a few feet of it. There is a four-light tracery window of four lights surmounted by geometric tracery in quatrefoil design. Underneath the large tracery window there is a row of small windows, a mediæval cross finishing the top of the gable. On the north side of the church, in Herwood-street, there is a similar entrance to the church, and this is the side on which the building is seen to the best advantage. The entrance is by a porch, with a pitched roof, the doorway being a double arch, resting on two shafts, which supported open pillars of polished Aberdeen granite, with the capitals carved, and resting upon curved bases. Over the arch here, as elsewhere in the doors and windows in the church, relieving arches are introduced; but here this relieving arch is surrounded by a monogram "1865," in a foreated design, and on the top of the porch is placed a cross of similar form to that on the monogram other eminences about the building. On the north side there are three two-light windows, and between the windows are buttresses, which in the design of this part of the building. In the clerestory there are on each side five windows of the cinquefoil shape. The appearance of the building is improved by the introduction of a string-course carried into the roof, and the long lines of the spire, in which the contrasted white and red stone are very effective. The roofing is of slate, relieved of white. A handsome palisading inclines the ground. The interior will accommodate 600 worshipers. The architect is Mr. James Nelson, jun., of Carlisle.

THE SINGING OF "DULCE DOMUM," AT WINCHESTER COLLEGE.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

"DULCE DOMUM" AT WINCHESTER SCHOOL.

THE hon. and learned gentleman Sir Wadsdell Palmer, in one of his poems, has celebrated the faithfulness of the Winchester boys in practising the ancient customs of their school. Our present Illustration will bear witness how the disciples of that venerable institution, which was founded by Bishop William of Wykeham nearly six hundred years ago, keep up one of its traditionary observances, and, to quote a line from her Majesty's Attorney-General,

Still, in the summer twilight, sing their sweet song of home.

The curious old hymn, or canticle, of monkish Latin, named from its burden "Dulce Domum," which may probably have suggested that of our popular song, "Home, sweet home," is sung on the last six Saturdays of "the long half" previous to the Midsummer holidays. On the last evening, in fine weather, the Commoners of the town and neighbourhood may be assembled within the walls of the college to listen to this interesting performance, which is generally assisted by a band of instrumental music. We read in Mr. Howard Staunton's account of "The Great Schools of England," originally compiled for this Journal, that the composition of "Dulce Domum" is associated with a very mournful story. "Three hundred years ago, it is said, a freshman scholar was left alone in the College during holidays. Oppressed with grief at the loss of his companions, he with difficulty contrived to wear away a few more days in solitude; but at length the solitude became too much for him, and the desolate child, after carving the words "Dulce Domum" on the back of a tree on St. Catherine's Hill, took to his lonely room and died of a broken heart." The following translation of the first two or three verses is taken from the English version, composed by the Rev. C. Wordsworth, formerly Second Master —

Come, companions, join your voices,
Hearts with pleasure bounding;
Sing we the noble lay,
Sweet song of holiday,
Joy of home, sweet home, resounding.

Chorus.—Joy of home, sing; home, sweet home, sing.
Joy of home, sing; home, sweet home, sing.
Sweetly, sweetly, sweetly, home sing;
Joy of home, sweet home, resounding.

See the wished-for day approaching,
Day with joy attended!
School's dreary course is run,
Safely the goal is won,
Happy goal, where toils are ended.
Joys of home.

Quit, my weary muse, your labours,
Quit your books and learning;
Banish all cares away,
Welcome the holiday,
Hearts for home and freedom yearning.
Joys of home.

We have much pleasure in announcing that this year an extra week has been added to the holidays; the college will, therefore, return on Monday, Sept. 4, and commence on Tuesday, Sept. 5.

The American Protestant church at Aspinwall was consecrated on April 21, the ceremony being performed by Bishop Potter, of Pennsylvania. A large number of the residents of Panama, both native and foreign, including the President of the State, the Governor, Consul, and other prominent inhabitants were present at the service. This is the first Protestant church erected in the United States of Columbia. It is built of stone brought from the Pacific Railroad Company's quarry on the isthmus, and has been erected at the cost of the company.

In a paper presented to the French Academy of Sciences M. Boudin has given some curious statistics of suicides by hanging in France. It appears that, from 1859 to 1864, the number of persons killed on the spot by the fall of thunderbolts was 1,000, of which 600 were males and 400 were females, or 24·7 per cent. In the same period 2,000 persons died from the only 2·6 per cent. In many cases the lightning, falling in the midst of groups of persons of both sexes, struck down only the males or women. In a great number of cases the electric fluid killed whole herds upwards of one hundred strong, either horned cattle, pigs, or sheep. Of the victims by lightning in the open fields were shrunk within a few days.

In the annual report of the operations of the Indian Post Office it is stated that the number of unpaid letters continued to increase. No native in the interior will trust the Post Office with a paid letter. "We frequently, in our own office," says the Friend of India, "receive letters containing the stamp inside, because of the conviction of the senders that a bearing' letters are more to reach their destination. Of the whole number two per cent were sent to the dead-letter office. This is not a large proportion when we remember that every year there are tens of thousands of pilgrims on the move in Northern and Western India, who have no fixed residence, and that our native freelancers are the most notorious in the delivery of letters; and more than they check the highway robbers who plunder the mails. Letters are sometimes found chalked on the outside of packages of articles, who are often on the frame, is generally illegible; and that the addresses are all in the cases of the vagrant kind."

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

M. Gastinel, director of the garden of acclimatisation at Cairo, has devoted himself to the restoration of the opium of Egypt, formerly so celebrated, to its ancient reputation, in which it has been warmly supported by the Viceroy. The deterioration he has found to be due not to the plant but to careless mode of culture; and he has raised the produce of morphine from the plants from 3 or 4 to 12·20 per cent.

The "parasites of copper" M. Reichenow compresses the simple bodies which exhibit a common character in the presence of copper, and which remain as a combustible residue on the form of a brown powder when the metal is treated cold with nitric acid. This residue, after solution of the copper, is treated with sulphuretted hydrogen, which throws down the sulphuret of potassium we obtain brittle metallic globules composed of lead, tin, copper, zinc, antimony, arsenic, and nickel, and also a little iron and silver.

Dr. Holmann's discourse on Lecture Illustrations, delivered before the Society of Arts, has been published, and has appeared in their journal. It will be found exceedingly valuable by all who have to lecture on any scientific subject. He says by the little facility with which the various elements of the four chemical types—hydrochloric acid, water, ammonia, and marsh-gas—can be obtained, the lecture-table becomes a kind of chemical museum. Even the researches of Professor Frankland and Mr. B. F. Duppa, carried on in the laboratory of the Royal Institution, have been rendered available for the lecture-table in the acrylic series of acids.

M. Ed. Bonjean, in the Journal de Pharmacie, advocates the cultivation of the palm-tree (Arenga saccharifera) as a new source for the production of a vegetable acid called, after the tree, arenic acid. Arenic acid can obtain in great abundance, in a very rough, primitive manner. As soon as the tree begins to blossom the stem is cut down to the top, which bears the flower, and collect the juice, which flows in bamboo tubes, which have been previously filled with ashes. This juice contains a considerable quantity of sugar, albumen, and a small quantity of nitrogenous matter in the juice. This juice, after boiling and concentration, yields 10 per cent of a brown sugar, which, in the small drop becomes solid, when it is cooled by being poured upon a cold surface. The remainder remains in the form of a thick molasses. This palm-tree does not require the rich soil necessary for the cultivation of the sugar-cane, but will grow in the poorest soil, and requires no manure or irrigation. The juice is not injured by fermentation, and can be preserved for a continued source of industry. We are glad to learn that this tree has been introduced into the British and Indian Colonies, and will become a sugar they term "jaggery."

The methods of preparing and using the black dye obtained from aniline are described by M. Lauth in the Bulletin of the Chemical Society of Paris. In January, 1863, a process was announced by Mr. John Lightfoot, of Accrington, which has been found to be successful in the dyeing of cotton goods, and which is now largely practised. The process was found to be deficient in giving intensity and retention of colour. M. Lauth has succeeded in fixing the aniline colour upon the fibre of cotton in such a manner as to permit of its application on a large scale; but the time is long, and the process costly. The fibre is steeped in a solution of salt of aniline, to which has been added a little chromate of potash, and then exposed to the action of the vapour of aniline. The fixation is not quite complete, and the colour is not so intense as that obtained its final structural condition—that is to say, after the coating of the fibre has undergone the action of a temperature of 212°. Here we may leave the thermo-electric currents the polarising force we seek. We know that light is diffused in every crystalline body, as also the action of the magnet. It seems easier to explain by thermo-electric agency than by the more widely-spread theories of light and magnetism. Faraday was the author of the striations which we have noticed, and also the fact that near the boundary of the growth of the crystal, in the case of the salts of lead, there are certain comparatively rapid and irregular the nickeniate phenomena are either absent or obscured. The magnetic currents are therefore the result of the same degree the thermo-electric ones, and therefore the general tendency of the direction of the crystalline growth.

In the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal is a note by M. R. D. Oldham, on the structure of the Shillong plateau, consisting of sections of hailstones, which exhibit their varied crystalline structure, and which, he says, "are usually composed of a nucleus of snow, either elliptical in section, while others, especially the larger, were irregular discs. The nucleus is generally surrounded by concentric envelopes of ice, and in the case of the larger hailstones the ice is formed in successive layers of clear ice separated by rings of less opacity; and the outer portion consisted of irregular, radiating, and confusedly crystalline ice. Sometimes there was a thin layer of agglomerate seed, the arrangement of which was irregularly radiate. Many of the hailstones were found to have exhibited more than one agglomeration of hailstones, in their axis. In the same number is a note "On a Method of Keeping Fish Alive for Food Supply," by Lieutenant-Colonel Sykes, F.R.S. He says that if salt water be put into an iron vessel and boiled till nothing but the dry salts remain, it will be found to be a tasteless powder. If this be added to a vessel of sweet hotbrick of fresh tank water, will keep alive a fish the size of a small herring for a considerable time, and will not taint the water in the least. He further states that he has then taken fish, alive, from Port Essie to Port Victoria, a distance of about 1,000 miles, in which time the fish ate no food except, occasionally, a fly or crushed cockroach.

M. Adrien Jean has communicated to the Academy of Sciences at Paris a sketch of the history of meteorological correspondence since the time of Aristotle, from the thermometer and barometer to the inventions and perfected. It appears that, early in the seventeenth century, Borelli, at Pisa, and Viviani there, and Hevelius at Dantzic, established, each in Lombardy, had organised, under the direction of the Academia del Cimento, a system of observations. The correspondence was continued in Italy and the Grand Duke of Tuscany, Ferdinand II., added to the most botanical

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE GRAND DUCHESS DOWAGER OF BADEN.

Her Royal Highness Princess Sophie Wilhelmina, Grand Duchess Dowager of Baden, who has died of consumption, at Baden, was the fifth consort of Frederick Theodore Wilhelmina, daughter of Prince Charles Louis of Baden) by whom she became mother of Gustavus Vi., King of Sweden, who was dethroned in 1809. Her Royal Highness was born on May 21, 1801, and was married, July 20, 1819, to Charles Leopold Frederick, Grand Duke of Baden, by whom (who died April 24, 1852) she had issue Frederick William Louis, the reigning Grand Duke of Baden; two other sons, Prince Louis William and Prince Charles; and three daughters—viz., Elizabeth Alexandrina Louisa, consort of Prince Reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; Princess Marie Amelie, wife of Prince Leopold of Lowenstein, nephew of her Majesty Queen Victoria; and Princess Olga Feodorowna, consort of the Grand Duke Michael of Russia.

SIR F. W. POTTINGER, BART.

Sir Frederick William Pottinger, Bart., who died at Sydney, New South Wales, on the 8th of April last, was the eldest surviving son of the first Baronet, the celebrated Indian statesman and diplomatist, Lieutenant-Colonel the Right Hon. Sir Henry Pottinger, P.C., G.C.B., by his wife, Henrietta, eldest daughter of Richard Sharp, Esq., of Hanwell, Middlesex, and his wife, a daughter of Joseph Philips, descended from the Lords Lisburne of Westmeadland. He was born April 7, 1811, and was, early in life, a Lieutenant in the Grenadier Guards. He succeeded his father as second Baronet in March, 1856. He latterly held a command in the mounted police of New South Wales. He was never married. He is succeeded in the Baronetcy by his only surviving brother, now Sir Henry Pottinger, the third Baronet, a barrister of the Inner Temple and of Lincoln's Inn, who was born in India on the 10, 1814, and married, Dec. 18, 1845, Isabella, eldest daughter of the late Rev. R. B. Hamilton, Rector of Farmington, in the county of Durham, and has a daughter and heir, Frederick Henry Maxwell, Henry's only sister, Henrietta Maria, is wife of Richard Stephens, Esq., of Eastington House, Berkeley-hill, a son of the Stephens of Cradley, Herefordshire, and Eastington. This family of Pottinger can boast of higher and more ancient origin than many of the nobility of England, being descended from Sir Ingram de Pottinger, family, on undoubted proof, shown a descent from Egbert, the first Saxon King of all England, and grandfather of Alfred the Great. According to the records in the Heraldic College, the Sir Frederick Pottinger just dead was the thirty-second in lineal descent from Sir Ingram de Pottinger. The Pottingers is that of the Baronet. The Pottingers of Berks (whom Mr. Henry Pottinger, the present Baronet, represents) are settled in Ireland; and Rossleigh were a junior branch, settled in Scotland, eldest daughter of the Rossleigh and their descendant Thomas Pottinger, in addition to that town in 1661. His son Edward, elected on the Royal Navy, commanded the Nonsuch in the expedition to the Spanish Main, during his Majesty he went to intercept ships coming from France with supplies for King James, and was lost, with all his crew, in the Channel, in the Dartmouth, man-of-war, on the night of the 8th of October, 1690. Thomas Pottinger, brother of Edward, was also lost in the Dartmouth. He was Sheriff of the county of Antrim, when William III. landed in that part of Ireland, and he sold part of his estates and raised three troops of cavalry for the monarch. Thomas was succeeded by his son, Joseph Pottinger, R.N., who married the sister of Thomas, the fifth Earl of Antrim. Joseph was Prince of James, the second Marquis of Montrose, and from him, whose grandson, Pottinger, Esq., of Mount Pottinger, was the father of Henry Pottinger, the first Baronet, a younger son of the family, as Child, in 1804, and may be said to have Burnett, a younger son of the family, as Child, in 1804, and may be said to have Burnett, a younger son of distinction by appointment to the Honourable the East India Company; his subsequent services in civil departments in India were most valuable, and, in many cases, of the highest importance. In 1840 he went out to China with pleniputentiary powers to arrange terms of peace, which he satisfactorily accomplished, and was created a G.C.B. and P.C. His death, in 1856, was looked on as a public loss. One of his surgeons was the late Major Eldred Pottinger, who was murdered at Cabul in 1836. Although Sir Henry's immediate family has been lessened by frequent deaths, it is to be hoped that his last surviving honour, his baronetcy may still be perpetuated.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the late Richard Thornton, Esq., has been sworn to under £2,000,000, and the probate duty paid thereon is £80,000 sterling. The abstract of the will will be given in a future Number, when it has passed the seal of the Court. Probate duty paid thereon is £80,000 sterling. The late Mr. Morrison, of Fore-street, whose personality was estimated at £8,000,000, was only sworn to £1,000,000, bearing a stamp duty of £40,000. This is a most progressive duty, unlimited.

The will of Major-General Augustus Samuel Hawkins, of her Majesty's Indian Army, lately residing at Kelvedon, Essex, was proved in the London County by his relict, Mrs. Margaretta Hawkins, the sole executrix. The will is dated Oct. 7, 1859, with a codicil made in 1861, and the gallant officer died May 30, 1865. He has made various bequests to his relatives and friends, and leaves the residue of his property to his wife.

The will of Admiral Henry Ducie Boger, of Hill-street, Berkeley-square, was proved in London by the executors—viz., Hugo Francis Meynell-Ingram, Esq., his nephew, and Admiral Richard Boger, R.N., of Bryanston-street, Wimbledon. The personality was sworn under £150,000. The gallant and distinguished Admiral entered the Navy in 1799, became Captain in 1812, and full Admiral in 1862. He was M.P. for Lisburn from 1826 to 1847, and was attached to the Court as a Groom of the Bedchamber. He was also a Knight Commander of the Bath, and a Knight of Hanover. He married, first, Miss Marriott, who died in 1827, and, secondly, Miss Boger, who survives him, but has left no issue by either. There are many liberal and handsome bequests amongst those who have enjoyed the friendship of the late Duke of York: this he leaves to his brother, Mr. Hugo Francis Meynell-Ingram, and to his brother-in-law, Mr. Boger, all his horses and guns he leaves to his nephew and executor, Hugo Francis Meynell-Ingram, subject to a legacy of £200, and a gun to each of his godsons, Hugo and Hamlet. To his sister, the wife of Colonel S. Waymouth £10,000, also an annuity of £1,000, and a life interest in certain funds. To his other sister-in-law, at her death, is to be divided between the two children of his said brother, Hugo, are to come to immediate legacy of £1,000 and a contingent interest in the legatees. A provision is also made for the Colonel should he be the survivor. There is a legacy of £500 to his valet, Thomas Hall, and £100 to each of the other legacies to his friends, and also to the servants.

The will of William Mann, Esq., of Eltham, Kent, was proved in London, by Messrs. Henry and Frederick J. Chester, solicitors, Nevington-street, the executors. The personality was sworn under £70,000. The testator died in March last, having executed his will Dec. 24, 1864. The legacies are as follow:—To his wife, Mrs. Mann, £2000; to his brother, Frederick Chester, £2000; and his brother-in-law, Henry Chester, £2000; to his nephew, the children of the latter, £1000 each; to the wife of Mr. Holland, Nevington-causeway, £1000; to the Kentish Benevolent Institution, which latter are to pass to her children, leaving also to each of them £1000; to the Lewisham Mission House, £1000; to the Lewisham Dispensary Association, together with a legacy of £1000 each; to his tenant Mr. Selden, Sabmongers' Arms, the freehold house, in the occupation of Mr. Fairbrother, and to each of his five children, £1000; to Mr. Evans, surgeon, Brixton, £2000; to Mr. Chester, clerk to Messrs. Chester, £1000; to Mr. Fairbrother, surgeon, £200; to his housekeeper £50, and to each of his other servants £20. All the residue of his property he leaves to the following charitable and benevolent legacies to be paid within twelve calendar months:—to the Surrey Institutions—the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, Blind school, and the Society for the Protection of the Gospel, each £1000; to the Kent Institutions—the New York-road, £2000; and to the churchwardens of Nevington £2000 for the poor of that parish. The residue of his property he leaves to be divided amongst the seven before-named charities.

An exhibition of plants, contributed by the working classes of the district of St. Saviour's, Heston, took place, on Monday evening, in the new schools-room, Cranford-street, Northperry-road. The collection of flowers, geraniums, and annuals brought a good number of prizes and received general commendation. A volunteer band played during the evening.

The latest news of Mr. Moens, the captive still in the hands of the Indian brigands, is contained in a letter written by himself on the 29th of June, in which he describes his sufferings, and the threats held out by his captors to enforce the speedy payment of more money. Mr. Moens's friends have succeeded in paying a large sum of money to the brigands, who still hold out for the sum originally demanded, and they now ask another opportunity of paying each further sum as it is in their power to pay. The money has to be paid in gold, at the time and place appointed by the brigands. Their messenger can only carry a certain amount, and to bar to pass through the villages of the mountaineers would be certain death. The Arab tribes on the frontiers are frequently unable to keep their hungry followers under the vigilance of the troops; and, when so baffled, they generally disappear from the neighbourhood for a fortnight or so, after which nothing can be done till they make another appointment.

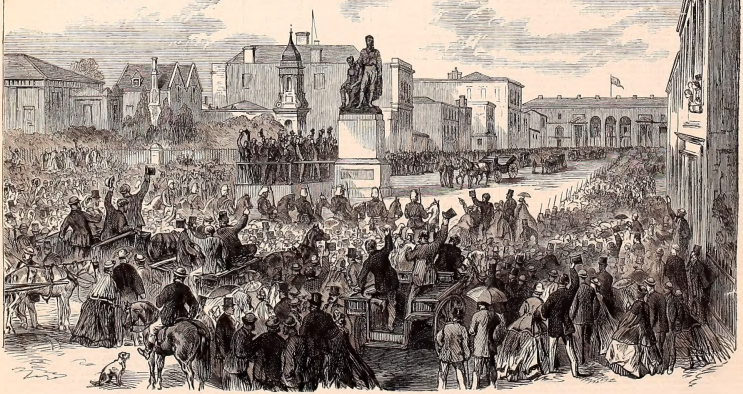
association, while taking the risk of any losses upon themselves. The society has only been in existence about eighteen months. It was founded by Corporal Platt and Ensign Matthews, the present hon. secretary and president of the society; and during its brief existence it has given two public performances—one at the Princess's and the other at the Bijou Theatre—besides two private performances at the Gallery of Illustration. Both the public performances were successful, and added to the prize and band funds of the corps. The pieces played in camp last week were, on the Wednesday, "Fiat and Francis" and "John Dobbs;" on the Friday, "A Wonderful Woman" and "Boots at the Swan." On Tuesday last, they performed "Still Waters Run Deep" and "Betsy Baker." Our illustration represents a scene in the "Wonderful Woman." The amateurs were most ably supported by Miss Hughes (late of the Olympic Theatre), Miss Clifford (of the Royalty), and Miss Harris (of the Haymarket), who, with her sister, Miss E. Harris, kindly volunteered their services. The other ladies who assisted were Miss Austen and Miss Marshall.

THE DRAMATIC COLLEGE FESTIVAL AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE annual festival and fancy fair in aid of the funds of the Royal Dramatic College at Maybury took place on Saturday and Monday at the Crystal Palace, and attracted on both days an immense multitude of visitors, who contributed very liberally to the pecuniary object of this amusing exhibition. The arrangement of the shows and stalls had not been materially altered from the plan laid down at the first of these fêtes. The central transept formed a grand square of stalls, and the nave was lined with shows of the most whimsical and eccentric kind. Richardson's was revived in more than its ancient glory, and provided with three new burlesque melodramas only a trifle more extravagant than "Solon Shingle" or "The Tootles." One was called "The Smuggler's Doom; or, The Sailor, the Syren, and the Secret;" another, "Alberto di Burgo; or, the Twin Brothers of Mantua;" and the third was "The Piratical Pirate of the Precipitous Precipice; or, the Premeditated Prey of Proud Power and the Prodigiously Proper Flight of the Preposterous Plunderer." The actors in this last drama had to mind their Ps, if not their Qs. The authors of the three pieces were Messrs. Nelson Lee, jun., A. Charles, and Ellis Reynolds. Wombwell's menagerie held its ground under the able management of Mr. Addison and Mr. J. Robins, notwithstanding the competition of fresher rivals. Professor Anderson, assisted by his clever daughters, had a conjuring booth with a fearful compound name; some of the chief comic singers from the music-halls supported what was called "A Hall of Merry Monsters;" Mr. Bucklstone directed a "Royal Steam Hippodrome," while Mr. Felix Rogers delivered a lecture on comparative anatomy, written by Mr. F. C. Burnand. Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul distinguished themselves amongst the stall-keepers by selling nicknacks from a huge beehive constructed of straw-bands, which looks picturesque in the Illustration we have engraved. It was, we believe, invented and designed by Mrs. Howard Paul herself. The motto of this commercial beehive was very neatly adapted from a verse of Dr. Isaac Watts's—

How do the little busy B's
Improve their hive and stock it,
And gather money all the day
From every opening pocket.

We are glad to say that the beehive alone produced more than £100 for the benefit of the Dramatic College. Mr. Toole, aided, of course, by Mr. Paul Bedford, told a story in mock German, acted as showman to a series of grotesque sketches illustrating his song of "A Norrible Tale," and exhibited his popular peep-show—this time inside out.



THE BURKE AND WILLS MONUMENT AT MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

THE BURKE AND WILLS MONUMENT AT MELBOURNE.

THE monument which has been erected in the city of Melbourne to the memory of Robert O'Hara Burke and William John Wills, who, in June, 1861, died in the bush from the sufferings and privations which they endured upon their return route in exploring the continent of Australia from south to north, was inaugurated on April 21. This monument—for which a sum of £4000 was voted by the Victorian Legislature—consists of a statue of each of the two distinguished explorers, placed on a granite pedestal 15 ft. high. The figure of Burke (the taller of the two) is about 12 ft. in height. The attitude in which the men are represented is natural and effective. Wills is in a sitting posture, and Burke is standing with his right arm resting upon his companion's left shoulder. He is surveying the country to the left, and is calling the attention of Wills to some particular features, and Wills, with pencil in hand, is making a note of them. Both men are in bush costume. A bronze moulding, enriched with the passion-flower, the sardoo plant, the desert pea, and other Australian plants and flowers, is to be placed round the base of the upper die of the pedestal, and bas-reliefs will adorn each side of the lower die; but these additions will probably not be completed until nearly the end of the year. One bas-relief will represent the starting of the Burke and Wills expedition from the Royal Park, on the 20th of August, 1860; another the return of Burke and Wills to Cooper's Creek from the Gulf of Carpentaria; a third, the touching episode of the natives weeping over the dead body of Burke; and the remaining one, the finding of King by Howitt's party. The site of the monument is in Collins-street—one of the principal streets in Melbourne—at its intersection with Russell-street.

The heroic story of Burke and Wills must be so well known to our readers that it need not be repeated here. We may mention, however, that the day chosen for the inauguration of the monument was the fourth anniversary of the return of Burke and Wills from the Gulf of Carpentaria to Cooper's Creek, when they found that the dépôt party left by Burke at Cooper's Creek had gone away only a few hours before their arrival. The ceremony of unveiling the statue was performed by his Excellency the Governor, Sir Charles Darling, who afterwards delivered an address. Professor Wilson, on behalf of the committee or board of design, having announced the completion of the work. We give an illustration of the proceedings. Little or no public demonstration had been arranged beyond the attendance of a portion of the volunteers, including the members of the Castlemaine corps, with which Burke was connected; but that the event excited great interest was proved by the gathering together of thousands of citizens of all classes to witness the ceremony. John King, the sole survivor of the small and noble band of explorers who succeeded in crossing to the Gulf of Carpentaria, was present on the occasion, which to him must have been a mingled pleasure and sorrow.

The selection of the design for the monument and the superintendence of its execution were intrusted by the Government to a board of design of seven or eight gentlemen. Their choice fell upon Mr. Charles Summers, a resident in the colony for the last ten years. Mr. Summers, who is an artist of considerable repute, obtained the silver medal awarded by the Royal Academy of England, in 1849, for the best model from the antique; also the Academy's silver medal, in 1851, for the best model from the life; and the gold medal, in the same year, for the best historical sculpture. The material as well as the workmanship is all colonial, the granite being from the Harcourt quarries, and the bronze being composed of Adelaide copper and Beechworth tin.

No. 1326.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

RESULTS OF THE ELECTIONS.

THE choice of members to serve in the next Parliament has been made. The excitement of the elections is over. The misgivings of candidates have been confirmed or dispersed, or their hopes have been realised or defeated by the event. Effervescence of party or political feeling, in some instances so hard to get up, in some so impossible, when up, to keep within rational bounds, has already pretty well subsided, leaving constituencies in a condition of proportionate flatness. The constitutional process has been passed through without much serious disturbance. Ugly eruptions, it is true, have made their appearance here and there, but they have seldom been more than skin deep—in no case, we believe, so deep as to be replaced by a lasting scar. The British public returns to its everyday business with a sense of relief that the inevitable crisis is over, and, as it strikes us, pleased with the issue, smilingly whispering to itself the old adage, "All 's well that ends well."

It will, we trust, be permitted us, as uncommitted and dis-passionate spectators of the recent struggle, to take stock of its results. In doing so, the first observation which occurs to us is that the verdict recorded by the constituencies is in fair unison with the judgment of the nation. Whether there be or be not defects in the machinery of representation requiring early and cautious repair, it will, we think, be admitted on all hands that, on the present occasion at least, there is no great divergence of opinion between the aggregate of the electoral bodies and the entire community. If there had been, there would have been an exclamation of surprise and dissatisfaction loud enough to catch the ear of the most careless. But no such has been no such outburst of feeling. No doubt, attempts have been made to account for what has happened by some who were sincerely anxious that it had happened otherwise, and ingenuity has been exercised to prove that no special political significance can attach to it. But all parties agree in accepting the decision of the elections as substantially the decision of the country. It is important, moreover, to observe that the mind of the people has been so expressed as to indicate its natural and inherent tendencies rather than its transient humour. It was affected by no extraneous influence evolved by an unforeseen conjuncture of circumstances abroad or at home. There was nothing extraordinary on the Continent, nothing in America, nothing in our home condition, calculated to give an adventitious colouring to public opinion from first to last. The elections therefore, if, as seems to be admitted, their results embody the political views prevalent in the United Kingdom, set forth the settled, not the transient, views of the population—such as have gradually taken possession of it, and which it holds altogether irrespective of the circumstances of the hour. In this respect, the judgment uttered is entitled to be regarded as mature and sound.

That judgment, unquestionably, is in favour of progress. It has been (to allude to Mr. Gladstone's own declaration) an authoritative but gentle intimation to the Legislature to "move on." The country has given its chief attention for several years past to the development or the preservation of Constitutional freedom abroad. Events appeared to render this necessary. Domestic interests of a strictly political character were put aside for a while. We have looked to our defences. We have regulated and improved our finances. We have attempted little more. The time has arrived for devoting ourselves heartily to the solution of those practical problems upon our mode of dealing with which the future of our own people so largely depends. The freest scope for labour, the freest play for conscience, the nearest approach to the extinction of pauperism, the housing of the houseless, the decent domiciliation of the industrious poor, the best means of getting rid of ignorance and of drying up the sources of vice, the surest stimulus to self-reliance—in a word, the amelioration of all the people may be raised to a higher position, socially, politically, morally, than that which they now occupy—this is the main work with which the ability and energy of the new Parliament have to grapple. It has been, comparatively speaking, neglected of late. It needs being looked to with mingled resolution and prudence. The voice of the electors, we think, being honestly interpreted, means that it is time for Parliament to commence in earnest in regard to such matters to cease. The country is prosperous, no doubt; but it is often in the very season of a nation's material prosperity that the seeds of corruption and decay are sown. It is then that there is yet remains abundant scope for wise legislation — for legislation which shall beneficially affect all classes of society, but chiefly the poorer and least favoured. It is clearly the will of the enfranchised portion of the population, speaking in the same and on behalf of the whole, that Parliament should advance in this direction and resolutely take up the work which is given it to do. The deadlock has been put an end to, and no pretext for stagnation remains.

It is hardly necessary, after this observation be correct, that the people of this kingdom are not prepared for any rash innovation. No change is desired for the mere sake of change. There is nowhere, that we can see, any disposition to play fast and loose with a view to rebuild. In regard to the main features of the Constitution, there is Conservatism enough to prevent any empiricism from getting the upper hand of calm, good sense. Even the most advanced Liberalism is fully unprepared to exercise self-restraint. If, however, the temper of the majority were less moderate than it is, there would be little danger of progress being made at a pace so rapid as to be dangerous. The Opposition, although not strong enough to prevent a decidedly onward move in the character of our domestic policy, is too strong to admit of success in any attempt—should an attempt be made—to destroy the equipoise of existing constitutional forces. The majority in the House of Commons will be supported by a majority in the House of Lords in discountenancing reckless legislation, and there is not the least fear that even rash and undesirable improvements will be too easily or inconsiderately effected. Every proposal to modify aught that the law now sanctions will of itself provoke a protest from the vested interests which it would disturb; and in this country, as we all know, rights in possession are always make a stout defence against claims in reason—"de jure" has at all times to struggle hard before it can oust "de facto." The country unquestionably desires Parliament to keep moving: but it desires that every step in progress should be aimed at and pursued with caution, sobriety, and wisdom, and that the future should be so approached as not to break with the past.

What effect the late elections will have upon the settlement of the vexed questions which divide opinion in the present day we leave to be disclosed by time and events. Our satisfaction rests, not upon any confident anticipation of the way in which such questions will be practically disposed of, but mainly upon our belief that the new House will, as in regard to many other matters so in respect of these, more accurately and more forcibly interpret the views and wishes of the country than did its predecessor. Since 1859, when the last Parliament was chosen, the public mind has undergone a sensible growth, and we think there is sufficient evidence that the machinery of representation has, within the last month, been fairly adjusted to it. Facts prove that there has been no retrogression of national feeling during the last six years, but a steady, albeit a slow, advance. Political life is more mature than it was, and therefore somewhat more responsible than the touchstone of experience. Because it has less of passion in it, it has not less determination; and, perhaps, it will fall to the lot of the Parliament just returned to show that a calm, moderate, unpretentious exterior is by no means incompatible with a condition of high-pressure and resistless power of will which will know how to enforce respect for its decisions.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Empress, with the Prince Imperial, left Paris for Fontainebleau on Thursday week.

The new loan of 250,000,000f., for the city of Paris, was issued on Tuesday; and, the bonds not exceeding the number of 500,000 to be issued, the subscription list was closed. The loan was offered to public competition for the sum of 250,000 bonds at 400f. each, repayable in sixty years at 500f., and paying only the moderate interest of 20f. per bond. But the great inducement to subscribe lies in the "lottery." The sum announced to be "drawn" for every year is 1,140,000f.

The Minister of the municipal department has resigned on the Government.

An Imperial decree has been published promulgating the international convention, signed at Geneva in August, 1864, for the care of wounded soldiers on the battle-field.

The marriage of the Princess de Polignac, formerly Mille. Mirès, with M. Roran, a merchant of Marseilles, has been celebrated at the Madeleine.

The composer Liszt, now an Abbé, has arrived in Paris, on a visit to his aged mother.

The match between the Paris Cricket Club and the Butterflies ended, yesterday, in favour of the latter. The Butterflies scored 116, and their second 93 : 209 in all. The Paris Cricket Club made in the first innings 56, and in the second 107, being a total of 172.

The ratifications of the Franco-Spanish treaty for the reduction of the Customs tariffs have been exchanged. The treaty will come into operation immediately.

BELGIUM.

Yesterday week the thirty-fourth anniversary of King Leopold's accession to the throne of Belgium was celebrated with great pomp at Spa, in the presence of the Royal family.

A Brussels letter states that the King has been again punctured for the purpose of dropsy. His Majesty's usual robustness of constitution enables him to resist those repeated attacks, but there is no hope of a definitive cure.

AUSTRIA.

Yesterday week the Lower House of the Reichsrath voted the Budget for 1866, in the form proposed by the Finance Committee, composed of members of both Houses, but not been able to agree, the Lower House adopted the views of the Upper House. The Budget has consequently received the Imperial sanction. On Thursday the Session was closed.

The resolution of Archduke Rainer as President of the Ministry was made known on Tuesday by an Imperial decree, in which the Emperor appoints Count Belcredi to the post. The Cabinet over which the Archduke had discharged his duties.

Herr Skene, Public Prosecutor of the Criminal Court, has been dismissed with a pension.

The Vienna Journal publishes a decree of the Ministries of Justice and War, touching the admission of Moldo-Wallachians of the Christian communion to the rank of officers and to the superior fixed tenures in the Austrian empire. The decree is based on the principle of reciprocity.

PRUSSIA.

The King arrived at Ratisbon, on Thursday week, on his way to Gastein. On the following day a council of Ministers was held, under the presidency of the King, at which definitive proposals to the Austrian Government were determined on.

There has been a political conflict in Cologne. It being proposed to give a public banquet to Herr Bockum Dolffs, from that town, the chief of the police sent notice to the committee that it had all the characteristics of a political association, and enumerated 11 to dissolve itself. The members of the committee protested against this decision and refused to sign the dissolution of the club. The journals that published the protest were seized. Next, the Provincial Court of Justice in the city cancelled the decision of the police authorities. The banquet took place. The festivities were persisted in, the banquet took place, last Saturday evening, in the Zoological Society's Gardens. The proceedings, however, interrupted by a military detachment occupying the garden, and the company dispersed. Disturbances of a serious character followed. In the streets, the Mayor, was interrupted by the Mayor. A detachment of cuirassiers was stationed before the hotel in which the banquet took place, and the steamer which conveyed the company was occupied by the troops. Many were also posted on the right bank of the Rhine. Next day, the persevering guests hereupon left by rail for Oberlahnstein, in the duchy of Nassau. Here they were cheered. A detachment of troops of the Duchy entered the Lahneck Hotel and ordered the assembled company to quit it.

Herr Bockum Dolffs has been appointed a post as President of the General Association of Working Men in Germany.

GERMANY.

Saxony and Bavaria have given notice in the Federal Diet of a motion demanding from Austria and Prussia information relative to the measures taken by them since 1851 last to being about an arrangement on the Schleswig-Holstein question, and proposing to divide the Danish succession between the members of the Diet, and to incorporate Schleswig with the German Confederation.

TURKEY.

Letters from Constantinople, dated the 19th inst., announce that the sanitary measures were being taken to prevent the spread of the cholera. The overcrowded barracks had been evacuated. Several cases had been reported since the appearance of the epidemic, and 158 cases had proved fatal.

News received from Alexandria states that the cholera has entirely disappeared from that city.

GREECE.

The King has returned to Athens from Corfu.

M. Rufos, the Minister of Finance, has been nominated President of the Chamber by 96 against 67 votes.

UNITED STATES.

It is reported that the Confederates determined to try Mr. Davis by a military commission in consequence of the discovery of additional evidence implicating him in the assassination plot.

Slowly, yet surely, the work of reorganising the southern States continues.

Judge William Marvin, formerly Southern District Judge of Florida, has been appointed provisional Governor of that State, with like instructions to those issued in relation to previous similar appointments. This appointment completes the work of supplying all the Southern States with civil executives, and in once more placing the entire sisterhood of the Union under the direction of Governors, either elected or appointed, acknowledging and in accord with the general Government.

A Virginia delegation waited on the President and asked him to amend the amnesty proclamation by striking out the clause excluding rebels with over 20,000 dols. Mr. Johnson replied that he saw no reason for granting their request.

Judge Sharkey, of Mississippi, has announced that the delegates to the State convention will be elected on Aug. 7.

General Howard, the chief of the Freedmen's Bureau, has instructed his subordinates throughout the south to see that slavery in no wise reposel in the form of apprenticeship.

It is officially estimated that the supplies of cotton in the country amounts to two million and a quarter bales, exclusive of the new crop.

The "Confederate Department" has seized much property at Richmond; and the publication of the Richmond Whig has been suspended by the military authorities.

An international trade convention, assembled at Detroit, Michigan, on the 11th inst. There were about 600 delegates present, composed of representatives of the leading trade and commercial associations of various cities of the northern, eastern, and western States, and of the British provinces. An organisation was effected, and the other business of a preliminary character was transacted. General Hiram Walbridge, of New York, was chosen president, and vice-presidents for each of the States and provinces were chosen. The object of the convention is three-fold: first, reciprocity between us and our neighbours; first, finances: second, commerce; third, lines of transit from east to west; fourth, the reciprocity treaty. The deliberations extended over several days. Various reports and resolutions were submitted, but the convention adjourned without important action.

There is an evident attempt on the part of some members of the Government and leading politicians to create an excitement on the question of Imperial Federation. Secretary Seward, Mr. Montgomery Blair had made speeches denouncing the French interference in Mexico and advocating the maintenance of the "Monroe doctrine."

Bortman's Museum, and many adjoining buildings, in New York, have been destroyed by a fire which was suspected to have been caused by an incendiary.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

A meeting of the Canadian Cabinet was held at Quebec on the 11th inst., and the Governor-General's speech announced Parliament dissolution on the 8th proximo.

A report presented, on the 14th inst., by Mr. Howes, of Nova Scotia, contained the declaration that the annexation of the British provinces would be followed at no distant date by the sale of the people of those provinces, and that should anyone attempt to go to the hustings as an advocate of such a scheme he would be treated as a revolutionist.

MEXICO.

Advices from Vera Cruz to the 1st inst. state that General Castagny, with a small force, had defeated a large number of Republicans at La Passion, Socuzco, and Alto Lucero, capturing much valuable property. The Republicans are, however, reported to have been successful in Michoachan. Guanajuato had been taken from the Imperial garrison of 300 men.

Marshal Bazaine was married on the 24th ult., with great ceremony, the Emperor and Empress being present at the wedding.

JAPAN.

A short telegram from Shanghai states that civil war was reported to have broken out in Japan.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The ceremony of swearing in Sir Hugh Rose, Bart., K.C.B., K.S.I., the newly-appointed Commander of the Forces in Bombay, took place, on Monday week, in the board-room of the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham.

The National Artillery Association, which has been recently established, under the patronage of her Majesty and the presidency of the Duke of Cambridge, to encourage the practical acquisition of volunteer artillery corps, will hold its first annual prize meeting and encampment next week at Shoeburyness. The prizes will be competed for, the whole under the Marquis of Abercorn, to the value of £50 by the Prince of Wales, the sum of £50 by the Duke of Cambridge, the sum of £20 by Lieutenant-General Palmerston, and various given by the association.

The examination of officers, candidates for admission to the Staff College, before the Vice-President (Major-General Hamilton) and the members of the Council of Education, began on Thursday week at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, and ended yesterday (Friday). The next examination of candidates for admission to the Staff College under the Queen's Regulation will begin on Monday next, the 31st inst., at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea. As soon as the first step in the list of candidates for admission to the examination will commence on Monday, the 6th proximo.

The Seventeenth, or the Prince of Wales's (Cameronians) Regiment, the left wing, embarked on Monday morning at Portsmouth for Bombay, on board the hired sailing-transport Himalaya, commanded by Commander —— On Wednesday week the Conflict, East India troop-ship, which had been chartered by Government for the conveyance of troops to India, left Gravesend for Portsmouth, to take on board the remainder of the regiment, 700 men in all under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Dempster. The Conflict, however, left the whole under the command of Surgeon-Major Cummins. The detachment of the 2nd Battalion 60th Rifles, under the command of Captain Lawrence, who embarked for Calcutta a total of six officers, 178 men, eighteen women, and twenty-four children. The whole under the immediate charge of Assistant Staff-Surgeon C. Walker.——The chartered troop-ship Sylvania, which had taken on board at Gravesend a detachment of fourteen officers, fifty-five wives, 362 non-commissioned officers and men, twenty-seven women, and thirty-four children, of various cavalry and infantry regiments, to Bombay, embarked her troops at Gravesend on Tuesday.

THE DEPUTY LIEUTENANCY MOVEMENT.

Colonel Wright, the Deputy Inspector-General of Volunteers, officially inspected the 28th Berkshire Volunteers (Middle Berks) on Saturday last, at Reading, and made some suggestions. This corps, mustering nearly 1,000 rank and file, under the command of Colonel Whitbread, went through a series of intricate manœuvres, all of which were creditably executed. The inspecting officer stated that he should make a favourable report of efficiency of the corps to the Secretary of State for War. The ground was efficiently kept by two companies of the 1st Oxfordshire (Paddington) Rifles.

The camp of the Berkshire volunteers was pitched in Queen Charlton Meadow, near the village of Keynsham, on Tuesday, for shooting for the prizes offered by the County Rifle Association occupied the week till Friday. The announcement that the meeting would be postponed till the 1st of August arose from circumstances which Major-General Seymour has explained to the committee of the Association. The meeting on Friday (Saturday) with a review of the Berkshire corps in Windsor Great Park, in which some metropolitan corps will probably take part.

The 1st Administrative Battalion Dorchester Rifle Volunteers encamped at Lulworth Cove, on Saturday last this week, for four days.

The following account of the doings of some of the Lancashire corps is epitomised from the Manchester Guardian:—Last Saturday the regimental prize meeting of the Manchester brigade, at which upwards of three competitions contains several valuable prizes in money, was held at Kersal Moor, Broughton, by the kind permission of Lord Wilton, who gives for each period of the year the use of the racecourse. The meeting was begun on the 1st Manchester met on the shooting-range, at Failworth, to compete for a challenge cup and several money prizes. The cup was won by Colour-Sergeant Heap, who also took the first money prize.——The members of No. 7 company of the 1st Manchester assembled on the range of the regiment at Astley, last Saturday, to compete for their challenge cup and five money prizes. Sergeant Mossop, who won the cup on a previous occasion, was declared the winner again, he also taking the first money prize.——At Liverpool, on Saturday, the 1st Lancashire Rifle Brigade met for 1st Manchester, by the kind permission of the company. The competition was for five prizes in money. The contest resulted in Private Woodhouse being declared the winner of the cup and first money prize.——Last Saturday the fifth competition for Lieutenant-Colonel Cunliffe's challenge cup took place on the ground of the regiment, at Astley. Sergeant W. Newton, who has been second on several occasions, proved the winner. Previous to the match the 5th (Oldham) corps were presented with colours by their aunt, Mrs. Cunliffe; a field piece (which was won by Sergeant J. Hinch), and four money prizes, which Sylvester's prize band has been asked for, and at the same ranges; they consisted of a silver goblet and four money prizes also. Private Lees was the winner.

On Tuesday Lord Londesborough invited the volunteers from the East Riding of Yorkshire, and other forces, to assemble in his park at Londesborough, near Market Weighton, on the occasion of the annual assembly of his tenantry. The usual fight occupied Londesborough Park, and a sham fight occupied Londesborough Park, and a sham fight occupied in tactics in the East Riding Artillery Volunteers, Hull, and other forces. After a review by Lord Londesborough, in the afternoon, the whole body of volunteers were entertained to dinner, at which entertainment had been provided for the whole persons, in an extensive shed erected for the purpose. Lord Londesborough occupied the chair, and numerous gentlemen of position in the county were present.

The Prince of Wales has given £25 and the Princess £10 to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Prince Arthur will inaugurate the Welsh memorial to the late Prince Consort, at Tenby, on Wednesday next.

The sittings of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference began at Birmingham, on Monday evening, under the presidency of Mr. Osborn.

Mr. Rose has presented a pleasure-ground of six acres, valued at £2000, to the town of Surrey, of which he has been elected M.P.

The Mayor of Devonport (Richard Dickson Smith) has received from the Prince of Wales twenty guineas, to be distributed amongst the poor of that borough.

A meeting was held last Saturday, at Warwick, presided over by Lord Leigh, Lord Lieutenant, with a view to secure the abolition of middle fines, so that the liberty of the press is concerned. Many speakers pledged themselves to take that cry could in the movement.

A floating dry-dock, fitted up with accommodation for 200 boys, was moored in the Mersey yesterday week. The vessel, an old war-ship, was presented by the Admiralty, and two steam tugs have been engaged at Liverpool merchants to fit the ship out properly.

The French ship of war Magellan, Captain Lebris; the frigate La Flandre, Captain Bachère; and the gun-boat Ariel, Commander Poirier d'Hauteserre, which have been at Plymouth since the 15th, were visited on Saturday by the Eastern Channel, on Saturday evening, for Cherbourg.

The Corporation of Leeds have laid the foundation-stones of two orphanages at Pudsey bridge and Bleckinghey, near Macfield. The building will contain accommodation for 160 boys at the same number of girls. They are both in the Gothic style, and have been designed by E. Welby Pugin, Esq. The children who are received in these institutions are supported for £10 each. Grace until they have been taught a trade. The cost of the buildings and the endowments is estimated at about £37,000.

On Monday the foundation-stone of a new townhall was laid by the Worst. Staffordshire. The old market-house has long been found unsuited to the growing requirements of the town, and last year it was decided to erect up a more modern and commodious one, at a cost of about £7000. The proceedings were opened by the Mayor, Mr. Heckelton, who stated that the old hall had been built when the population numbered 5000 inhabitants, and was now unsuited to the wants of a population of 40,000 or 50,000. Mr. Scholey, Mr. Twigg, and Mr. Swinnerton also addressed the meeting. On the conclusion of the day's proceedings, a dinner was given in the hotel of the Corporation. High-street.

Among the many riots that have disgraced the recent elections no one has been more lamentable than that which occurred at Bolton, and which had gathered round the Conservative hotel, when a farmer, who was believed to be the crowd, struck one of his assailants in the face with a knife, and great riot. Soldiers were sent for from Windsor; but, before they could arrive, the mischief was done. The man who struck the blow was arrested, and Rotherham and Sheffield are other towns in the north in which the Reform Riots were gutted, and a considerable amount of property was destroyed. Many of the ringleaders were captured, but the excitement was so great in the constituency to chosen its representatives; and, on the day of polling (Monday), disturbances broke out afresh in the side-by-side localities of Rotherham and Ashby the mob beat possession of the town for several hours. The Townhall windows were broken, considerable damage was done to the property of private persons, and many of the police and rioters were seriously injured. Assistance had to be obtained from Doncaster and Derby before the disturbance, and the polling was adjourned.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was present, on Thursday week, at a banquet given in the Exhibition building at Dublin, to the jurors and foreign representatives in connection with the Dublin International Exhibition. Mr. R. I. Guinness presided. In responding to the toast "The Lord Lieutenant and Prosperity to Ireland," his Excellency said that he was on the day of the opening of this Exhibition to the present time it has been a great and a wonderful success; one is naturally led to look for the cause to what has brought them worthy of attention on this occasion; and I think that the cause is to be found in the circumstance that the objects of this Exhibition are more purely industrial than those of any previous one—I mean the revival of Irish industry. I do not mean to pass over the manufactories of Belfast, which, from its long one of the greatest and most successful manufactures in the United Kingdom; but I alluded particularly to the manufactures which are struggling into existence in the south and west, and looked over the various articles exhibited in this place may have seen that there is perhaps no greater kind, no greater variety, than that which is manufactured with rag found in Ireland, and likely, I think, it properly cultivated, to form a permanent branch of industry for the south and west also the excellent woollen fabrics. I was especially struck with this—that you have not only the raw material, but you have the skill to work it up in the best manner, but with the least waste. In a country like Ireland, where there is an abundance of unskilled labour, it is obvious that you must commence with the branch that requires less skill. I was much pleased with the exhibition of Mr. Whitworth, who has been recently returned for Drogheda. I visited no establishment of the kind with more interest than to the establishment of Mr. Whitworth, and that the manufacturers of the country, and in order to secure a fair competition with the world, I think it is of the utmost importance that there should be a permanent machinery system of education established that there should not be some considerable manufactures. I would have being dependent on agriculture alone and the consequence is that there is nothing to which she can have recourse when those seasons are unfavourable. More than that, you must have manufactures in order to secure the return of towns, not only in England, but throughout the world, is coincident with the improvement and increase of manufactures; and I am sure that nothing will be the evils which are the necessary result of the collection of large masses of people in great cities, we must recognise, on the other hand, that the good—for such civilisation as we have been accustomed to is inseparably connected with the growth of large towns. One of the most important duties of the thriving towns; but there you cannot get unless you can establish for this country a large class of manufacturers.

LAW.—At Stafford, yesterday week, Mr. Justice Byles, in his charge to the grand jury, made the following remarks on the subject of adulteration:—"But that time I had the honour to appear here a multitude of people were afflicted with offences among the most contemptible in the range. I am happy to observe that there are no cases of that description before you on this occasion. I refer to the offence of adulteration. It is a most offensive crime, and not more contemptible and more cowardly than it is really cruel. I cannot help thinking that for much of the tranquillity which now prevails in this country you are indebted to the vigilance and activity, the devotion to public duty, and the eminently conciliatory manner of your Local Board. I deem it right to say this, because I am about to keep making our further observation on the subject, which is this—that I fear some legislative interposition will become necessary. I am not aware that a bill has been brought into the Upper House by Lords St. Leonards for the establishment of a court of arbitration. I have other information to show that there are at present no provisions for arbitration, by which I do not mean trading, the result of which is that the public are left to the unrestricted mercy of the tradesmen according in which might be supposed. This, however, is not the place to offer any suggestion on the subject, but I cannot refrain for the consideration of those among you who are in Parliament, that the system of compulsory arbitration has been recently introduced into war courts of law, to the immense advantage of the commercial world—to the saving of time, litigation, trouble, and money in an incalculable extent. Perhaps I may be allowed to observe, that in magistrates' courts arbitration has been tried of repealing the consolidation laws without making any adequate provision to meet the difficulties which might have been expected, and the result has been the same as in this country, even from the very beginning."

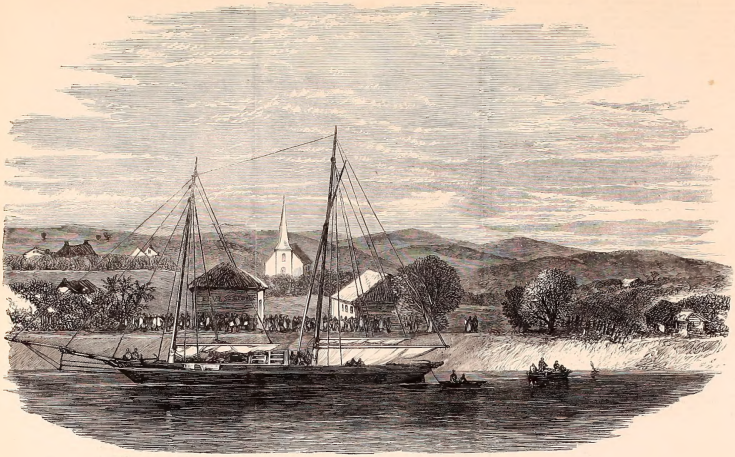
The trial of Bongo and Gollmore for manslaughter on account of the destruction of the Sultan of Sulu's treasure vessel, which was burnt at Singapore on Wednesday week, is still to be remembered, was the keenness of the gang that took up the rafts over which the prisoners had escaped from the wreck. Mr. Gallimore was the first witness for the prosecutor of the case. The jury acquitted Gollmore, but brought in a verdict of guilty against Bongo. Sentence was deferred.

At the Assizes of the Western Circuit held in Dorchester, on Monday, Mr. Robert Stuart Cotton, late steward of the land of Lord Ilchester, was sentenced to three bills found against him by the grand jury for the embezzlement and misappropriation of large sums of money belonging to the Earl. At the end he had been removed by certiorari to the Queen's Bench Court, fresh recognisances were entered for the appearance of the prisoner at the Old Bailey on the 19th of next month.

A charge of poisoning has been brought against another surgeon. The case occurred in Asburton, Devon; and the victim was a family of four or five persons, who died of arsenic. The surgeon, Mr. Bartlett, has been arrested, and bail is required that they suffered from poison. Mr. Herapath, the well-known analytical chemist, has been engaged in investigating the case, and has found that the family had another medicine found strychnine in the prisoner's house. No positive proof was, however, found that the deceased had taken poison in the pie; and the strongest evidence against him was the repetition by one of the witnesses of a threat or wish, in which the prisoner had stated that he should be glad if the family was poisoned. Mr. Spencer has been committed for trial.

The last mail from Bergeut, says La Presse, brings intelligence of the death, in that town, on the 2nd inst., of Prince Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg. Duke Duncker of Denmark and had been for eight months travelling in the East, and had visited nearly all the celebrated spots in the Holy Land.

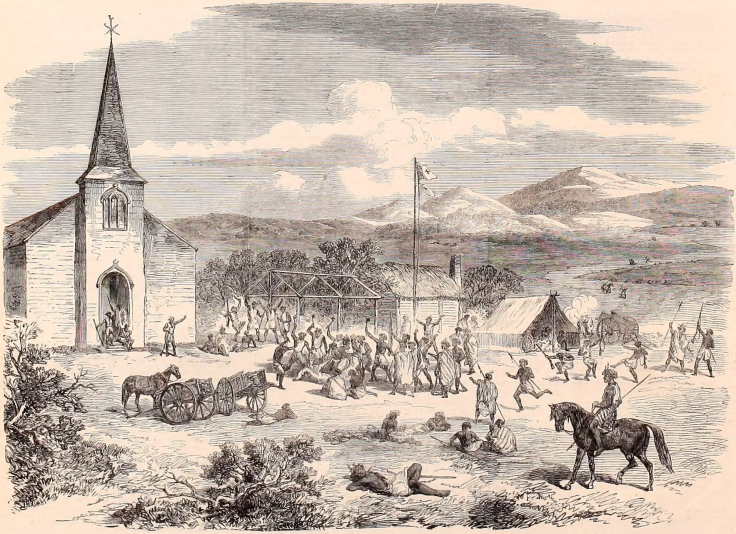
METROPOLITAN NEWS.



The great fruit and vegetable show took place in the Royal Horticultural Society's gardens on Saturday last; and, notwithstanding the attraction of the Wimbledon review, there was a considerable attendance.

The Building News states that the large roof which covers the Imperial Riding-school, Moscow, hitherto the largest in the world, is to be surpassed by one which is being built at St. Petersburg after the new London terminus of the Midland Railway Company with a wrought-iron roof of 240 ft. clear span, and 100 ft. wider than that in Moscow.

The Metropolitan Board of Works held a meeting, yesterday week, to consider the plans for the intercepting sewer, to intercept the Eastern Embankment of the Thames, which recommended that Mr. Ridley's tender be accepted, and that the contract be entered into for £30,000 higher, should be adopted. This gave rise to a keen discussion and to several amendments, which were successively negatived, but in the end it was agreed to refer the question back to the committee for further consideration.



A large number of noblemen and gentlemen have lately formed themselves into a committee, for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of the late Duke of Devonshire, for many years Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who, by his personal friends and admirers of his genius, and by the public generally, for his munificence. THE MURDER OF A MISSIONARY BY THE MAORIS IN NEW ZEALAND.

CAPTURE OF THE REV. MR. VOLKNER ON BOARD THE SCHOONER ECLIPSE, AT LEVY'S WHARF, OPOTIKI.

THE war of races which has been going on for two or three years past in several provinces of the northern island of New Zealand does not seem likely to arrive at a speedy termination. While General Cameron has failed to make any sure progress in the campaign which was to have cleared the country between Wellington and Taranaki, other districts, especially in the neighbourhood of Auckland, have been disturbed by the revolt of a large number of the Maori population, who seem to have relapsed into worse than their original savagery, combining, like the Taepings of China, a fantastic perversion of some of the terms and symbols of Christianity with the most licentious and bloodthirsty practices of their pristine heathenism. The hideous superstition now prevailing, which takes the name of the "Pai

SAVAGE DANCE OF THE PAI MARIRE FANATICS.

Maries" from the Virgin Mary, of whom they have heard from a French Catholic missionary lately amongst them, is held to sanctify the commission of any crime or offence. It appeals to the worst passions of the converts. There is no estimating the consequences that may result from its demoralising influence. Wherever it has yet gained ground the civilising habits that had taken years to grow up have receded before it. Prompted by this deadly fanaticism, the natives have committed a horrible crime at Opotiki, on the east coast. The victim was a missionary clergyman, the Rev. Carl Sylvius Volkner, a native of Ousel, Germany, and a student of the Hamburg Missionary College. He came to New Zealand about eighteen years ago, as a catechist, in connection with the North German Missionary Society. After some time he separated himself from that body; and, having made the acquaintance of Bishop Selwyn, was offered an appointment as missionary under the Church Mission Society, and his usefulness then became more clearly developed. He was ordained a deacon and priest of the Church of England. He first commenced his labours at Taranaki, and then took up his residence at Kohaoga, Archdeacon Maunsell's station. He also resided at Tauranga and Opotiki, at the last of which pursued his calling at Tauranga and Opotiki, at the last of which pursued his calling at Tauranga and Opotiki, at the last of which pursued his calling Government at Auckland. Mr. S. Levy voluntarily consented to remain as a hostage for the performance of the bargain, while Captain Levy, with the schooner, would go down the river and communicate with the authorities at Auckland. In the mean time, the Messrs. Levy obtained leave to take Mr. Vollmer's body, and to give it a decent burial, at least they could. After digging a grave, in which the mangled remains were interred, along with the clothes Mr. Vollmer had worn, they affixed a head-board, inscribed "V. March 2, 1865," and surrounded the whole with a fence, the situation being close to the back of the church. On the 15th of March Captain Levy and party re-embarked and went down the river, just outside the mouth of which they found a British war-steamer, commanded by Captain Pressmann. This was her Majesty's ship Eclipse (bearing the same name as Captain Levy's schooner); the Bishop of New Zealand was on board Pressmann, having heard of the death of Mr. Vollmer, he had come on purpose to save Mr. Grace. Captain Levy was anxious that he should go ashore, the man-of-war's men to go up the river, in the steamer's boats, and deliver Mr. Grace by force of arms. He replied that there was not the slightest chance, by this plan, of getting Mr. Grace alive, as the Maoris would carry him miles away into the bush, as soon as the boats appeared in the river. Captain Levy then left with his own boat, with two of his own men—John Moore and Lewis Montague—and quietly rowed up the river to the village where he had left Mr. Grace. He found that gentleman walking up and down the yard of the house in which he was imprisoned, and which stood on the bank of the river. Only some women were left to guard him, all the men being assembled at a meeting or council to debate what they should do at the approach of the steamer. Captain Levy then determined to risk his own life and those of his companions in order to rescue Mr. Grace. Bringing his boat close to the shore, he desired Mr. Grace to jump in; then made him lie down flat, at the bottom of the boat, and covered him up with some rope sheets, so that he was entirely hidden from view, while the women on shore set up a loud cry, and brought the men, with their guns and rifles, running out in pursuit. Captain Levy had the two other sailors pulled as fast as they could, with the tide and current in their favour, down to the ship, which they happily reached in safety. Mr. S. Levy and Tewai, the interpreter, also got away as soon as they could.

The prudent, generous, and courageous behaviour of Captain Levy and his brother is attested by a memorandum which Mr. Grace also witnessed the whole of these transactions at Opotiki. A public meeting was held, on the 31st of March, in the Supreme Courthouse, at Auckland, where resolutions thanking the officers concerned for their conduct were unanimously passed. It is from the sketches made by Mr. S. Levy that our Illustrations are copied; but the brief narrative is compiled from the Auckland newspapers we have received. The natives give two reasons for Mr. Vollmer's death—one, that it was a special reason, and one is general. The special reason is that the Opotiki natives had been told by Mr. Fox, the late Minister to the Governor that they were carrying on a secret correspondence with the rebels. The general reason is that they hate all white men, and all missionaries. They say they came first to the country and bought land; then the Government came next, and the missionaries used their influence to buy land for the Government; and that from this came the present war sprang. The fanatics declare, therefore, that they will murder all missionaries. It is reported that Mr. Vollmer's life was taken by way of utu, or compensation, for that of a man named Te Aruinua, one of the prisoners brought in after the fight of June 11 between the Arawas, who are allies of the English, and the other Maoris who are hostile to us. Their chief, Te Kooti, was not with them, but in which the widow of one of the Arawas who had fallen in the battle was sitting and mourning over his corpse. This widow was a woman, seeing Te Aparuaa, caught up a gun and shot him dead. He was the brother of Kereopa, the person whom we have named as the chief instigator of Mr. Vollmer's murder. These facts may help to account for what has been done at Opotiki.

JUDE MERINO RAM EXHIBITED AT THE DRESDEN SHOW.

The modern "golden fleece" is said to be in Saxony, and the above ram, which was sold for a large sum at the recent Dresden Show to one of the largest breeders of the country, is said to be a fair purpose. He was the property of Mr. Adolph Heiger, of Lenetwitz, Saxony, and was exhibited along with several others which were sent that gentleman. They gained several prizes, as well as an extra gold medal, given by the Government. The largest ram is said to have weighed 192 lb., and the largest ewe 125 lb., and both would yield from 8 lb. to 9 lb. of clean washed wool. The flock of Mr. Heiger was established, sixty years ago, from about the same district from Spain by the Elector of Saxony. Some of them were exhibited at Battersea in '62, and the official report of the Royal Agricultural Society has some comments on the breed in general.—"There were none of the Dishley Merinos, whose early maturity, without loss of the Leicester, made such a fine feature at Poissy in 1857. The French Merinos are valuable for their size and mutton, as well as their wool, which weighs from 8 lb. to 16 lb. in the grease. Those exhibited were of good, fair form, up to the eyes and down to the toes in wool, which is inferior to that of the Spanish Merino, the ewes of which race were small and deficient in constitution. Those from Saxony were not equal in size to the French, though very famous for the weight of fleece; but their consideration which had to yield to that of superior form when an umpire was called in to decide between the English and Saxon judges."

It is reported that Government has determined to make additional efforts for obtaining the release of Mr. Rassam and the other Europeans who are in the hands of Theodore, the Abyssinian Sovereign; and that Mr. Hargrave, the well-known traveller, has been appointed to go out to Abyssinia for that purpose.

THE LAYING OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

The Sketches furnished by our Special Artist engaged in providing Illustrations of the Laying of the Shore End of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, at Foilhommerum, Port Magee, in the Island of Valencia, in the county of Kerry, did not reach us from so remote a place in time for us to include in the Engravings of this week's Publication; but several of them will appear in our next, as follows:—

Camp of the men employed by the Telegraph Construction Company on the road from Killarney to Valencia, near Dingle Bay.

Landing the heavy Shore-end of the Cable along the Line of Boats from the Steam-ship Caroline.

Sir Robert Peel and the Knight of Kerry calling for Cheers of Joy on the Cliffs of Valencia.

The People on Shore Watching the Caroline as she went out to Sea with the Heavy Portion of the Cable.

Interior of the Telegraph-room at Valencia: Receiving Telegraphic Messages from the Ships.

We expect to receive from our Artist further Illustrations of the progress of the great undertaking, and we shall publish them as early as they can be engraved.

THE VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO PLYMOUTH AND CORNWALL.

Continuing the Illustrations, began this Week, of the Visit of their Royal Highnesses to the shores of the West of England, our Next Week's Pages will contain the following:—

View of Plymouth Sound, with the French and English Ironclad Squadrons at Anchor.

The Ball in Honour of the Prince and Princess at the Royal Victualling Yard, Stonehouse.

The Prince and Princess Landing at St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall.

Landing of their Royal Highness at Penzance.

The Prince and Princess at the Botallack Tin Mine.

The Prince of Wales at the Land's End.

The price of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Saturday next, August 5, containing the above-named Illustrations, with others, will be Fivepence Stamped, to go free through the post, Sixpence.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1865.

WHILE the nation is filled with an earnest feeling of regret that a terrible fate should have been allotted to three gallant men, of the order of which we are all justly proud, it appears to us to be a fitting moment for calling attention to the deserts and to the doom of three other gallant men, equally subjects of the British Queen, who have also died a violent death in an expedition of exploration. The names of Lord Francis Douglas, Mr. Hudson, and Mr. Haddo may properly be associated with the names of Mr. Pauter, Mr. Harding, and Mr. Goldwyer.

We have just received from Western Australia a copy of the Perth Gazette, in which we find authentic details of the fate of these long-missing adventurers. They went forth, so long back as last November, on an exploring tour, and it was brought to a rapid termination. The natives hung upon their route; and though, when the former chose to approach the English party, they were kindly treated and presented with game, they were evidently hostile. Coming at first unarmed, they returned with spears, and it was necessary for the explorers to frighten them away with a harmless discharge of firearms. But they had resolved on the destruction of those whom they came to succour; and we find that on the night of Sunday, the 13th of November, the English were closed in upon by the savages near a small lake called Ingedana, not far from Lagrange Bay, and were slain. They had previously killed all their dogs, as they were found very close together. They were destroyed by blows on the head. The natives had committed the deed from sheer love of slaughter. They did not plunder the dead. Months afterwards the bodies, or what remained of them, had the ornaments which belonged to the slaughtered men; Mr. Pauter's hand had his ring, and Mr. Harding's watch was under his breast, nor had their money been taken. One of their horses was found speared at some distance.

The colonists had, as we learn from private sources, long made up their minds as to the fate of their friends; but in February a searching expedition was sent out by the Local Government, under Mr. Maitland Brown. The packet returned with the remains of the brave explorers on the 10th of May, and a public funeral was arranged for the 17th of that month. "a cavalcade," says the Gazette, "in its most interesting résumé of the melancholy story, "intended not to be one of show and ostentation, but simply a mournful testimonial of the esteem in which the departed were held by the whole community."

So have died three more of our dauntless pioneers. If in placing their names beside those of the gallant gentlemen who have just paid with their lives for a fruitless victory over the terrors of the Mandershein we seem to be out of contrast, we at once and sincerely disclaim any idea of the kind. We hold in all honour the "mounting mind" and dauntless pluck of the travellers who, year after year, scale the tremendous heights of Scotland and Switzerland regions. And as our eyes say that such feats ought to be discouraged; though we have a right to urge that valuable lives should not be cast away in an obviously-unequal combat with dangers, and that unnecessary precautions should be taken in the matter of course. While we deeply deplore this last and catastrophe, we are in no mood to throw general blame upon all who, for the pure love of adventure, or, influenced by mixed motives, achieve feats which do not appear to have any other object than demonstrating the courage and endurance of those who perform them. It is because it is the nature of the Englishman to do these things when no one has asked him to do them that he does far more things at the call of duty—rows with a handful of men under the black battery of a vessel that could blow him to pieces, and cuts her out; storms, with a handful of men, a fort crowded with raging savages, and recaptures the colours surrendered by a force which they might have eaten; or, more bravely still, walks with a handful of men through vast regions, peopled with hostile natives and ruled by greedy and cruel kings, and returns loaded with treasures of experience and rich with new treasures of science. There would be small philosophy—nay, small knowledge of the world—shown in discouraging adventure. It has given us all we have.

We would, however, desire that the same recognition should be accorded to the devoted resolution of the explorer as is given to the daring courage of the adventurer. "It is a fact cry to Devil" that one of these three previously unknown men in making their way through a comparatively uninteresting region are not likely to be noticed in England unless attention be called to the subject. The journals of the brave Stuart, lately given to the world by Mr. Chapman, have shown what Australian exploration is, and that its dangers and difficulties are of that monotonous character which wears out the energies when it cannot break them down. For Messrs. Harding, and Goldwyer there was little in store, but they not been murdered, but the recurrence of the same story—dense thickets, insufficient or dirty water, sandy plains, and ignoble food. Day by day took them further from civilisation; and it was not for a few hours, but all through the journey, that their lives were in their hands. They were no members of a celebrated club, honoured in the first society; there was no field day or proceedings, and their utmost success would have made no lions of them. No graceful pen awaited their return, to place their narrative, in costly form, on the tables of their distinguished friends; no decoration would have been given them when the muster-roll of English travellers should be called over at the close of the season. But they went on their way, aware that their course might end at a moment's notice; and it did. They died suddenly, and by violence. While we pay all honour and all tributes of sorrow to the brave Englishmen who rest in the snows at the foot of the vengeful Matterhorn, over which they triumphed, let us not forget the brave colonists under whose lowly grave in the cemetry at Perth our pioneers of the West have stood in mourning—in mourning for men who were slain in the discharge of an allotted duty.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THINGS are looking favourable for the Atlantic Telegraph. The shore end of the cable was successfully landed at Valencia on Saturday morning last. Connections were made with the instrument-room at 12.45 p.m., Greenwich time, in the presence of a large concourse. The Knight of Kerry and Sir Robert Peel made congratulatory speeches. Three cheers were given for her Majesty and three for the President of the United States. The paying-out of the heavy shore cable, twenty-seven miles in length, was completed by the Caroline late in the evening. Shortly after four, on Sunday afternoon, the splice with the main cable on board the Great Eastern was completed, and the paying-out began from the Great Eastern. Disquieting rumours were circulated on Tuesday to the effect that the cable was in danger of failure. We are glad, however, to learn that the hitch which occurred had been put right, and that at the time of our going to press all was working smoothly. Telegrams continue to be received from the gentlemen on board the Great Eastern, signalling that the work of laying the cable is proceeding satisfactorily; and the gigantic vessel, herself one of the wonders of the world, which is bearing across the Atlantic the wire that is to make thought simultaneous in the two hemispheres, has so far advanced on her way that every one may indulge in hope of a successful issue.

A despatch from St. John's, Newfoundland, states :—" In anticipation of the successful laying of the Atlantic cable a telegraph line has been constructed from this place to Heart's Content, the point selected for the landing of the American shore end of the cable. An office has been fitted up there, and everything that can be done to advance the securing of the shore end of the cable has been performed."

Several Illustrations of the laying the Atlantic telegraph cable will appear in this Journal next week when we shall enter more into detail on this deeply-interesting subject.

THE COURT.

THE Queen, with the junior members of the Royal family, continues at Osborne House, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday week her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena, visited the Royal Victoria Hospital at Netley, which on the occasion alluded consisted of the Countess of Gainsborough, the Hon. Emma Lascelles, Colonel the Hon. A. Hastings, and Captain Seymour, C.B., of Bidduph. The Queen crossed from Osborne Pier in the Royal yacht Alberta, Captain the Prince of Leiningen, and landed in front of the hospital at a quarter before seven o'clock in the evening. Her Majesty was received by Colonel Wilbraham, the chief officers of the establishment. A large number of the convalescents were drawn up near the entrance for the Queen's inspection. Her Majesty afterwards entered the building and passed through the wards of the sick, addressing kind words to the sick, and inquiring into their cases. The Queen returned to Osborne at half-past eight. Princess Helena attended by the Hon. Horatia Stopford, drove out.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena and attended by the Countess of Gainsborough, drove in the neighbourhood of Osborne.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena and Princess Albert Victor, drove in her carriage to Whippingham. The Jenner arrived at Osborne.

On Sunday the Queen, Prince Leopold, and Princess Beatrice attended Divine service, performed at Osborne by the Rev. W. I. Cronlow, Chaplain of her Majesty's ship Racoon. Princess Helena and Princess Louisa attended Divine service performed at Whippingham.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louisa and Princess Beatrice, drove out in the neighbourhood. The Hon. Emma Jenner left Osborne for London.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold, went on board the Racoon, screw corvette, Captain Seymour, C.B., at Osborne Pier. Her Majesty embarked, at six o'clock, in the barge of the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, and was received by Captain Seymour. The vessel had the honour of being presented to her Majesty, after which her Majesty entered over the ship. On leaving, a Royal salute of twenty-one guns was fired.

The Queen has conferred the vacant Order of the Garter upon Earl Cowley, and the Order of the Thistle upon the Duke of Argyll.

DEPARTURE OF THE QUEEN OF THE NETHERLANDS.

The Queen of the Netherlands left London on Saturday last upon her return to Holland, after a visit to this country of about a month's duration. Before leaving Claridge's Hotel, where her Majesty has resided during the lengthened stay, she received the visits of persons called to take leave, and on passing to her carriage—at open barouche drawn by four greys—for Marchioness Conyngham, the Lord Steward, ladies to the Queen, and the noble Marchioness presented a beautiful bouquet. Her Majesty, who was accompanied by the Prince of Orange and the Netherlands Minister, was conveyed to Woolwich, where the Cyclops, a Dutch steam-frigate, awaited her arrival, and on board which was lying alongside the river wall of the arsenal. Commodore Dunlop, R.N., commander of the Royal dockyard, Commander Towney, and Commander Biddlecombe, assistant-superintendent of the yard, with Mr. Parkyn, acting superintendent of stores, were in attendance, paying their full salutes as her Majesty was conducted down the gangway by Commodore Dunlop, and on reaching the deck of the vessel a party of Dutch sailors presented arms, the officers their muskets and fixed bayonets, presented arms, and the officers saluted. As soon as the Queen was on board preparations were made to steer the vessel. Her Majesty thanked the Commodore for the attentions shown her, and graciously accepted a bouquet from Mrs. Dunlop. The Queen took an affectionate leave of the Prince of Orange, and, having known repeatedly to the departure of her Majesty, one of the three who were present, the Cyclops was towed into the stream by the Monkey, and in a few minutes was on her way to sea.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales made an excursion from Mount Edgcumbe, yesterday week, in the Royal yacht Osborne, to Falmouth. At eight o'clock in the evening their Royal Highnesses went on board the Osborne, which lay at anchor in Plymouth Sound. A concourse of people was assembled in boats and loudly cheered the Prince as they passed in the barge to the Osborne. Their Royal Highnesses entertained at dinner the Duke of Devonshire and the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, the Duke of St. Albans, the Duke of Somerset, and Lord Fitzhardinge, Lord Lieutenant of Devon, Captain Ducey, Commander of the Osborne, Captain Le Bris, Commander of the Gomer, and several gentlemen of the suite. Baroness De Grey, Lieutenant-General Keeling, and Major Grey. The band of the Royal Marines played upon the forecastle. The night air was fine, and was brilliantly illuminated.

At half-past three o'clock, on Saturday morning last, the Osborne got under way and left Barnpool for the Cornish coast. As the yacht passed the point of view a Royal salute was fired from the batteries there stationed there. The volunteers of the neighbourhood, under the command of Captain R. Thomas, also fired a salute from their guns from their battery of two 70-pounders, and were answered by the firing of the Royal standard on the yacht. The Osborne arrived at Fowey, and anchored in the harbour, in half-past six o'clock. She arrived at nine o'clock, from the Fowey and Polruan batteries, by the men of the coast artillery. The Prince and Princess of Wales accompanied by the Duchess of Sutherland and the Duke of St. Albans, left the Osborne, and proceeded in the barge, to the quay at Fowey. A salute of 21 guns was fired as their Royal Highnesses disembarked. Their Royal Highnesses disembarked at the Victoria Gate, and were received by Sir C. Rashleigh, the Rev. Dr. Treffry, and Mr. Kendal, M.P. An address was presented, and graciously received by the Prince. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards proceeded up the quay. A guard of honour of the 3rd Cornwall Rifle Volunteer Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Gilbert, lined the way. At the end of the quay two arches of evergreens, surmounted by banners, with the words, "Welcome, Albert Edward and Alexandra!" and "Welcome!" were erected on each side of the granite memorial raised in commemoration of the visit of the Queen and the Prince Consort to the town in 1846. The Prince and Princess drove to the "Fleur," the residence of the Rev. Dr. Treffry, and passed some time in inspecting the numerous objects of interest for which this ancient building is famed. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards drove to Par and witnessed the extraction of a plate of pure silver, weighing 2000oz., from the silver-smelting works of which Dr. Treffry is proprietor. A beautiful specimen taken from this plate was presented to them by Dr. Treffry. Their Royal Highnesses and Princess drove to the Fowey Consols Mine and saw the "man engine," which is used for the conveyance of miners up and down the mine, a depth of 250 fathoms. At Tywardreath the day was observed as a holiday, and the people greeted their Royal Highnesses with every demonstration of loyalty. From this place the Princess, accompanied by the Duchess of Sutherland, the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, and Dr. Treffry, and attended by Countess De Grey, returned to Fowey, and partook of luncheon at the house of Dr. Treffry. Their Royal Highnesses proceeded aboard the Osborne at three o'clock. The Prince drove from Tywardreath to Fowey in a carriage and pair, about nine miles inland. His Royal Highness landed in the vicinity of the castle, and returned to Fowey at five o'clock. The Prince went through the streets to the landing-place, and was thence rowed out to the Osborne. The Prince and Princess visited Polruan. Dr. Treffry, and Colonel Peard at dinner on board the Royal yacht.

The Osborne set sail at three o'clock on Sunday morning for Penzance. A salute was fired, and answered, from the Fowey batteries, the inspecting commander of the coastguard, immediately embarked in the Osborne's gangway-boat, and was received on board the Royal yacht bows to, and Captain Fellowes boarded her, and under his supervision the vessel was steered through the narrow channel on the western side of St. Michael's Mount. At half-past ten the Osborne steamed across the Mount Bay, and, under the lee of the land, passed the eastern side of the bay, where she anchored. The Prince and Princess attended Divine service performed on board the Royal yacht. At half past one the Osborne steamed back to her former anchorage, and the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Mr. John St. Aubyn, disembarked, and proceeded in the barge to the quay at Penzance, ascended the flight of stairs on the eastern side of the basin. Upwards of a thousand people assembled and enthusiastically cheered their Royal Highnesses, who graciously responded to the salutations. The Prince and Princess were received upon the pier by Lord Elizabeth St. Aubyn, Lady Audrey Townshend, Mr. Edward St. Aubyn, jun., Captain Sullivan, R.N., Lieutenant Fox, R.N., and Lieutenant Bowden, R.N. A Royal salute was given by the coastguardmen. The Prince and Princess proceeded to the carriage, preceded by the mounted officers of the coastguardmen. Upon arriving at the gates of the castle grounds the Prince and Princess were met by Mayor (Maraion) 12th Battery D.C. Artillery, of which Mr. John St. Aubyn is Major. The Prince was drawn up in open order and presented arms. Beyond the volunteers the young women employed at Mr. Michael Mount were stationed, holding baskets of flowers, with which they strewed the path. The Prince and Princess passed. Their Royal Highnesses then climbed the mount, which is 250 ft. in height. At the summit they were met by Mr. St. Aubyn with assistance. The Prince and Princess remained a short time upon the plain in front of the castle, and enjoyed the magnificent scenery which the view from the castle commands. Their Royal Highnesses passed across the plain to the terrace, escorted by Lady Audrey Vivian and other guests. The Prince and Princess partook of luncheon at the castle. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards returned to Osborne. Their Royal Highnesses entertained at dinner on board the Royal yacht the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, the Duke of St. Albans, the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, Lord Vivian, the lieutenants of the county; Lady Vivian, Countess De Grey, Lieutenant-General Keeling, Major Grey, Mr. St. John St. Aubyn, Mr. Hussey Vivian, Mr. E. St. Aubyn, jun., Lady Audrey Townshend, Mr. and Mrs. Williams, General Peard, Captain Fellowes, Captain Sullivan, Lieutenant Bowden, R.N.; and Lieutenant Peyton. The Prince and Princess passed the night in the Osborne.

Their Royal Highnesses visited Penzance on Monday. At ten o'clock the Mayor and Corporation, with the Recorder, went on board the Royal yacht, which lay at anchor in Gwavas Lake. The civic authorities took an honourable place in the procession. Mr. Francis Corniss Bosse, the Mayor of Penzance, was introduced to his Royal Highness by Lieutenant-General Keeling. The Mayor presented an address, to which the Prince returned a response. The Mayor, the Prince and Princess landed at the Albert Pier, amidst the cheering of some thousands of people. The Prince and Princess were received by Mr. John St. Aubyn, Mr. Edward St. Aubyn, Sir Hussey Vivian, Lord Vivian, Lady Audrey Townshend, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Audrey Townshend, the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, and other distinguished guests. The Mayor, Corporation, Recorder, and Mrs. Keane, the Mayoress, presented a bouquet of flowers to the Princess, and were then presented to their Royal Highnesses by Cornish serpentine and steatite from Kynance Cove, set in silver. The bracelet contained the inscription, "Mr. and Mrs. Keane, Penzance," the crosses—viz. St. Michael's Mount, Blogan, Lelant, St. Buryan, St. Ives, and Gwinear. The western battalion of the Duke of Cornwall's volunteers, 364 strong, under the command of Lieutenant-Tremenheere, the Lieutenant-Colonel of the battalion, were drawn up along the pier, and presented arms. The Mayor, cap in his hand, and frequently bowed to the volunteers and to these assembled upon the pier. The volunteers afterwards gave a cheer, and four, and proceeded slowly up Market-yard-street. They drew themselves up in front of the Town Hall, accompanied by the boroughschool children, teachers, and friends, to the number of between four and five hundred, who sang the children's hymn, the National Anthem. As the Royal carriage arrived at the middle of the road it stopped, and the Mayor read the address. The address over, the Mayor then solicited the favour that the Princess would name the new road about to be opened. With this request the Princess graciously complied, and named it the Alexandra-road. The address it now open for public use. Their Royal Highnesses then proceeded to the southern end of the town, by Chapel-street, Causeway-head, and drove in the direction of Tolcarne and Treville for the Land's End. The children's address was read by the schoolmaster, and each received a new silver threepenny piece in commemoration of the visit of their Royal Highnesses.

On Tuesday, early in the morning, the Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Duke of Sutherland and Dr. Treffry, took a pleasure visit to the Scilly Isles. The Prince and his party landed from the Osborne in Hugh-town Bay, which was crowded with boats filled with the inhabitants with great enthusiasm. His Royal Highness visited the school-room and the church, and then, accompanied by Mr. Augustus Smith, M.P., the Lord Proprietor of the Scilly Isles, proceeded round the island. The Prince next proceeded to Treco Abbey, the residence of Mr. Smith, M.P., and after a visit to the gardens a luncheon was served on board the Osborne in the evening, and Mr. Smith received the honour of knighthood.

The Osborne sailed at half-past four o'clock on Wednesday morning for Carnarvon Bay, which was reached about eight o'clock. Here the Princess of Wales came on board, and the Osborne directly sailed for Beaumaris. Soon after the Osborne passed the Penmon Point from Pendeinis Castle as the Osborne moved into the inner harbour. The Corporation of Beaumaris and the Corporation of Denbigh went on board and presented addresses. The Prince and Princess of Wales, attended by the Earl of Mostyn, the Duke of Sutherland, the Duke of Somerset, General Keeling, Major De Grey, and Lady De Grey, then landed at the breakwater, having on board the Princess of Wales' "Beaumaris," and were greeted with the warmest demonstrations of welcome. Their Royal Highnesses were driven in a carriage round Pendeinis Castle, and then to the Victoria Terrace, where they entered into the town. They next proceeded in the Duke of Sutherland's yacht up the River Menai as far as Victoria Rock at Malpas.

The Prince and Princess of Wales returned on board in the evening, and were to proceed homewards yesterday (Friday).

The Duke of Cambridge attained his forty-eighth year on Tuesday last.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby have arrived at Prince of Wales Terrace, Scarborough, for the season.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde left their residence in Stratton-street, Piccadilly, on Saturday, to pass a few weeks at Holmhurst.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.

The marriage of Lord Edward Cavendish, M.P., youngest son of the Duke of Devonshire, and the Hon. Emma Lascelles, Maid of Honour to the Queen, daughter of Lady Caroline Lascelles, is appointed to take place on Aug. 2.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Lady Louisa Cavendish, only daughter of the Duke of Devonshire, and Captain the Hon. Francis Egerton, R.N., eldest surviving son of the late Earl of Ellesmere.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

WE are glad to learn that it is proposed to place a marble statue to the memory of Sir Joseph Paxton in the landscape-garden of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, the latest triumph of his genius. A committee of noblemen and other persons of mark has been formed for the purpose of raising funds; and Mr. Grove, of the Sydenham Crystal Palace, has consented to act as honorary secretary. Subscriptions will, no doubt, pour freely in for so noble an object as that of erecting a monument to the designer of the Great Exhibition building of 1851.

While the young gentlemen at Cambridge, Eton, and the more recently constituted seminaries of learning have only just broken up, or even now fill their streets with plenty of proofs that "Black Monday" is elsewhere about commencing. The papers are full of the most sensational advertisements wherein we which exhibit the generosity of the scholastic character, it is not to say. On one side of them, oh, nay brethren? Have we not seen before with that "Head of a establish- ment" is anxious to receive "the Bishop's—where to meet "with two or three promising boys of real ability to read with his own boys"? Now we do not suppose he would say "two or three," and, of course, we are to believe his assertion that, if the boys show "real ability" they shall receive "attentions far above the average"—that they will be received "on very moderate terms." Then there are the touching announcements of "a limited number" for a fashionable school—none but the sons of gentlemen received," except, perhaps, the son of the teacher, who pays only "one half of terms;" or the scheme, who nourishes the flame of the school—the midnight lamp of the usher, whilst the principal lights the taper of learning within the breast of the young Waxwick. Next, a "professional lady has an opportunity to introduce a young lady into a first-class school, where she will have the very best education, with the very accomplishments, by all the most superior masters and a resident Parisienne, for twenty guineas!" But others offer "a home to one or two who may consider the opportunity not to be missed" of the Queens school for £16 per annum. Think of this, my worthy friends, in connection with the price of bread, and imagine how little of that necessary your growing boy or girl will get in addition to the "home" and the education for the above-named modest French cookery; and then, if there words, necessarily few and only recommending, in this time of hurry, to your notice in quick succession, followed by modern accomplishments, have any effect, send your boys and girls to the nearest of the above-named private curators of the spine with the latter, and decent pay secures a fair share of the former leaning something.

When the Duke of Wellington died on the 16th of April, 1818, was about, a large crowd of working men met in Trafalgar-square, and were quietly dispersed by the police. Literature and Art, to us, is a delightful Saturday next. When this Paper will be in the hands of most of its readers, the members of the Guild of Literature and Art will be entertained at a festival, with Mr. Dickens in the chair, and Mr. R. Lytton, Bart. The rising and risen spirits of the day will then inspect the newly-built houses, to which, I have now belongs to all the ladies of England. Bishop Colenso leaves in August for his see—a stormy sea, where his rebellious clergy are like Shakespeare's waves, "curling their monstrous heads," the chief actors and actresses are commencing their country engagements; the geniuses who conduct the Owl retire, after their hard labours, again to their leg-bush and fit companions; Tom Thumb, his wife, and friends leave town for the country; and Mr. Alfred Mellon's concerts, cheap excursions, and blooming lavender loom in the distance, or appear in the streets, or are announced on the walls of London. Verily, harvest, autumn, and the shooting-season are rapidly approaching!

VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO PLYMOUTH: THE ROYAL YACHT OSBORNE PASSING THROUGH THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH SQUADRONS OF IRONCLADS IN PLYMOUTH SOUND.—SEE PAGE 86.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY'S SHOW AT BIRMINGHAM: GENERAL VIEW OF THE SHOWYARDS

THE VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO PLYMOUTH.

THE visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Plymouth came to an end at daybreak on Saturday morning, when the Royal yacht Osborne, on board of which they had passed the night, steamed out of the Sound, proceeding to the coast of Cornwall. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at Plymouth, as mentioned in our last, on the previous Tuesday afternoon, having left the Isle of Wight early in the morning of that day.

Our illustration on page 81 represents the Osborne passing between the French and English squadrons of ironclads which lay in the Channel on the day when she was of course welcomed with a Royal salute. The French vessels were the Couronne, commanded by Admiral Rigault de Genouilly, the Invincible Magenta and La Flandre (name for Le Brun, French grandson of Ariel, under the command of Commodore Le Brun. The English squadron, as we have already stated, was a friendly one, consisting of the English ships of war—the Sovereign, Achilles, Ocean, and Lord Clyde—which were present on the occasion of the meeting of the Queen and Prince Consort—which were also present in the Sound two other ships of our Navy, the frigate Frederick, and the sloop-of-war Scout, one of the Austrian navy, the frigate Frederick, commanded by Captain Wahlinger. The Osborne, with the Royal Family on board, was also in the fleet of every description which the harbour could hold; conspicuous among which was the gliding swiftly to and fro, the yacht of the Lords of the Admiralty. It was Enchantress, the steam-yacht of the Lords of the Admiralty. It was also a two o'clock when the report of twenty-one guns announced that the half-past two o'clock when the report of twenty-one guns announced that the Royal ensign repeated from ship and fort, proclaimed that the Royal standard was at last flying at the main of the Osborne. The weather had been raining, but just as she came in sight the clouds began to disperse, and a bright sunshine soon lit up the scene, which was one of the most splendid kind. The Osborne, on her after midship mounds for the mid-day gloom. The Osborne, on her arrival, took up her moorings in Hamoaze. Immediately after her arrival where there is a private landing-place, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, whose guests their Royal Highnesses were to be during the first few days of their visit to Plymouth, went on board to welcome them, and later in the forenoon of that day received on from the Plymouth Corporation had the honour of being received on board by his Royal Highness and presenting him with an address. An address was also subsequently presented to the Prince by the Admiralty and other authorities of Devonport.

Hayle and work quarter to five that the disembarkation of the Royal party was announced by the firing of a salute from the ships in Edgcumbe battery, and then surrounded. Just above the landing-place the which the Osborne was moored, and the men-of-war in the harbour, the officers of the garrison and of the men-of-war in the harbour, the officers of the garrison and of the men-of-war in the harbour, the officers of the garrison and of Archæology of the Month.

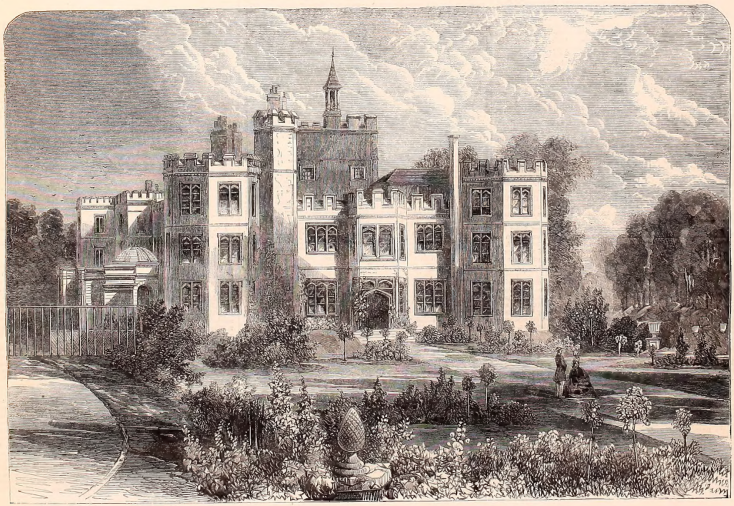
The Archæological Institute Congress at Dorchester, under the presidency of Marquis Camden, K.G., will commence on Tuesday next, Aug. 1, when the inaugural meeting will be held in the council chamber at the Townhall. After the presentation of the usual congratulatory address, the Rev. C. W. Bingham will give an introductory sketch of the antiquities of the county of Dorset. The museum will then be opened, and a party will be formed to visit the museum, which will be opened, and a party will be formed to visit the museum, which will be open daily during the meeting. On Wednesday, among others, papers will be read by the Rev. W. Barnes on Ancient Dorset; and by Professor Willis on Sherborne Abbey Church; and an excursion is made to Maiden Castle, Bere Regis Church, and an extensive tumulus in Winterborne Kingston. On Thursday will be devoted to an excursion to Sherborne, when Professor Willis will accompany the visitors to the examination of the ruined buildings; after which the archæologists will be entertained by Sir Wingfield Digby at Sherborne Castle. In the evening Mr. Walter Rawlings, Q.C., by the Dean of Chichester will read a memoir of Babington, the Rev. T. C. Sevestre will read a paper on Cardinal Morton, and Mr. Hall one on Glastonbury Abbey; and Mr. T. Bond, Art. Professor Willis one on Glastonbury Abbey; and Mr. T. Bond, F.S.A., one on Corfe Castle, tenth century coins, and Wimborne Minster will conclude the proceedings. On Friday, Sherborne Abbey, Oakhampton's take place. On Monday, Athelhampton, and Baron Hamburg will entertain the party at Milton Abbey. On Tuesday, Aug. 8, the congress promises to present a concluding meeting will be held. The congress promises to be, in variety and historical interest, a very attractive meeting, with the enjoyment of the fine air of the Dorsetian downs.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has sent for exhibition to the Archæological Institute a pair of gold spurs, magnificent in design, found, during the present year, at Padstow, in Cornwall. Their value, as mere bullion, is estimated at £6. But the Rev. Mr. Hitchins has also obtained, described the circumstances under which they were found; gave an account of the various persons who had inherited the property with the manor any title to them; and explained how they belonged, as consecrated treasure, to the Prince of Wales, and not, by virtue of legal franchises which belonged to the Earls of Cornwall. Mr. Smirke concludes the ornaments to be of Irish manufacture, and, in their opinion, there seems to be considerable doubt, but not Irish, as to the colony of Irish is known to have settled on the western coast.



Mr. R. C. Newton has described to the Institute his recent visit to Bodrum to inspect the excavations now being carried on there on the portion of the site of the mausoleum, in 1859, by Mr. Newton and his assistants, in consequence of the refusal of the owners to part with the houses built thereon. The houses have now been demolished, and the site of the British Museum has been almost completely explored. Many more sculptures of the colossal horses from the mausoleum has been almost completely explored. Many more sculptures of the colossal horses from the mausoleum, including fragments of the colossal horses from the have been found, including fragments of the colossal horses from the chariot group, several colossal heads, and a colossal figure of a female, among which are two figures, one a Greek, the other an Amazon. Mr. Newton hopes that the fragments recently found by the excavators in the mausoleum may be identified as belonging to the sculptures we possess from the same building.

The Archæological Association Congress will commence on Aug. 21 and extend to Aug. 26, under the presidency of the Duke of Cleveland, K.G. The programme is as follows:—Monday, Aug. 21: Reception at the Castle, Durham; Inaugural Meeting, Aug. 22: Inauguration at Durham; Address; Introduction of Papers in the Castle, Durham: Lumley Castle; Chester-le-Street; Lanchester; St. Cuthbert's Church, Durham; Durham Cathedral and Monastic Buildings; Finchale Abbey: Notice and Papers in the Castle, Durham. Notice and Papers in the Castle, Bishop's Auckland; Darlington; and concluding Soiree in the Castle, Durham. The programme is to be varied by visits of visitors, Mr. George Walker has just produced a new edition, rewritten and amended, and republished, of his history of the Castle and Cathedral Church of Durham. There is likewise appended a most valuable sketch of Durham. There is likewise appended a most valuable sketch of Durham. There is likewise appended a most valuable sketch

THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION PRIZE MEETING AT WIMBLEDON.

THE volunteer gathering at Wimbledon was brought to a brilliant close on Saturday last. Early in the afternoon the prizes were distributed by Lady Spencer, and afterwards the Duke of Cambridge reviewed several of the London corps. The day was fine, and both proceedings were most successful. There was a large and fashionable attendance, the number of visitors being estimated at from 40,000 to 50,000.

THE PRESENTATION OF PRIZES.

The presentation of prizes, as far as the arrangements were concerned, was much the same as that of last year. Sitting accommodation was provided for hundreds of spectators in front of the marquees, which, in event of excessive heat or rain, were available for shade or shelter. Out in front of the seats a long table covered with blue cloth bore the wealth of artistic beauty which had been on view in the exhibition tent. Above the table a broader frame, covered with crimson, supported the Elcho shield. The reserved seats were all fully occupied, and beyond the inclosure there was a goodly fringe of spectators as far as any view of the proceedings could be obtained. Lady Spencer occupied a chair in front of the table, and gracefully performed the duty which she had undertaken of presenting the prizes.

Lord Elcho, Viscount Bury, Earl Grosvenor, the Hon. C. Lindsay, Lord Spencer, Captain Tempier, Captain Midmay, and others, surrounded her Ladyship, and as many of the prize-winners as remained to receive the reward of their skill were formed in line on the right.

Prior to the presentation, Lord Elcho (as chairman of the council) said:—"The days are long past when on occasions such as these it is necessary to say anything with reference to the volunteer movement. Therefore, all I will say with reference to it is that you must be aware how much these prize competitions contribute to give permanence to this important national force. Everyone who has been at Wimbledon this year, as in former years, must, I think, be prepared to bear witness to the interest with which all volunteers take in rifle-shooting when they come here, and the zeal which they show in contending against each other. I think you will be glad to hear that, upon the whole, this has been a satisfactory meeting. We have had to contend with two elements of evil—one the natural element of bad weather, which was not as favourable this as last year; and the other the element of evil which has affected the whole kingdom—I mean the dissolution of Parliament. Notwithstanding that, however, we shall be able to show, I think, that the results of the meeting are eminently satisfactory. It was impossible for us, having fixed the time and made all the arrangements, to postpone our meeting to meet the dissolution: indeed, we fifteen think that, if the two clash, it is the dissolution of Parliament which ought rather to give way to the Wimbledon meeting (Cheers and laughter). Be that as it may, it has been one of those events which, like cold winds in spring, try weakly constitutions; but we believe that it will be found our constitution has stood this severe trial well. I will say no more with reference to this subject, but merely mention that Lady Spencer has kindly consented to present the prizes on this occasion, I think every person here present, volunteers and others, will rejoice at her having consented to do so, because there is no lady connected with the volunteer force better entitled to fill that position; for there is no volunteer connected with the force who has done so much for it as her lord, Lord Spencer (Hear, hear). Thanks to him, we have now, yearly, the pleasure of meeting here; and I am sure that when these proceedings are closed, for no person will such hearty cheers be given as for Lady Spencer, the wife of Lord Spencer, who kindly allows us to come to this place to hold our meetings. Without further preface, I will read the list of prizes, and Lady Spencer will present them."

Lord Elcho, as each winner came up, explained the conditions of the prizes and the particular excellence of the competitor's shooting who won it. The first notable clue was that of Mr. Peterkin, of Cambridge University, the winner of the prize given by Mr. Rose, who had ran 500 yards, fired twelve shots, and made eleven bull's-eyes and one centre in five minutes, or only one less than the highest possible score. When it came to Mr. E. Rose's turn to appear, as winner of the first stage of the Queen's prize, Lord Elcho referred to the fact that he was the only volunteer who wore both the gold and silver badge of the association, as being a winner of the gold and silver medal of the association. Mr. Fixley, of the Victorian, also a Queen's prize man, Mr. Bishop, and Mr. Sharman were warmly cheered for having made the highest possible score for the first innings. The latter gentleman received by anticipation the hearty greeting it is the custom to extend to the lucky competitor who wins the Queen's prize, Lord Elcho observing—"I need not say I see you know who this gentleman is." The Harrow boys were very warmly received on account of their having carried off the Ashburton challenge shield two years in succession, and because one of those who came forward to receive the shield on behalf of the school had also won the silver cup which Lord Spencer gives annually for the highest individual score in the public schools competition.

Colonel Lindsay, of the St. George's, in presenting, as usual, the St. George's challenge vase and the prizes and badges of competition, said the winner, Sergeant Penser, of the 4th Staffordshire, had won the gold jewel last year out of 400 competitors, and this year out of 500. It was to be regretted that in such an interesting competition, which largely affected the country to which the winner belonged, even if that gentleman himself was unable to receive marks-arrangements, to be present, some officer or some one from North Staffordshire should not have been delegated to receive the prize. He then gave the dragon cup to Private Hamerton, of the 12th Middlesex, the gallant Colonel said that it was to be won by the highest total of prize, and that there was a third and not less agreeable stage, the presentation of a cup of dragon engravings, the accumulations of the entries after payment of all expenses. In the first year he (Colonel Lindsay) had the pleasure of handing over ninety-five such sovereigns, in the year following 165, last year 180, and on the present occasion 220. He hoped they might go on until he had exhausted all the regular series, which, if given in favour of the Scotch, would have made them the winners, expressing his opinion that Captain Ross had distinguished himself in taking the scores at the firing-point as final. After such a splendid match, there was no disgrace to either side in having been beaten; it was the best competition that had ever taken place at Wimbledon, and he hoped that the next would be as good.

In referring to the China challenge cup, won by the county of Somerset, Lord Elcho intimated a desire to send to China for the cup; but it soon became obvious on this point his proposal fell flat.

Private Sharman was loudly cheered on being called up to receive the county prize. Lord Elcho said he believed no county ought to take the prize more than Yorkshire, for there was no more hearty body of volunteers than in the ridings of Yorkshire.

This concluded the actual business of the presentation. Three hearty cheers were given for Lady Spencer, and were followed by similar demonstrations in favour of the Queen, of Lady Elcho, and of the leading members of the council; and thus ended the business of the meeting of 1865.

The following were the prizes for distribution. The list is remarkable, as showing how closely, in many cases, the scores are run, and they were won approximates to the utmost score that could be attained in the prescribed number of shots:—

The

REVIEW AND SHAM FIGHT.

It has been the custom to wind up the proceedings of the Wimbledon meeting with a review of volunteer corps, and this salutary custom was not departed from on Saturday last. While a number of representatives of the volunteers were receiving the prizes which they had won, whole battalions and divisions were assembling on the common, and taking up their position preparatory to those movements which would show that, while some of the more skilful members of the force had proved they know how to handle the rifle, the great bulk of the volunteers had not neglected the less showy and scarcely less important qualification of drill.

If a Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief arrived on the ground shortly after five o'clock, accompanied by a brilliant staff, including Sir J. Yorke Scarlett, the Quartermaster-General; Sir Richard Airey; Major-General Lord P. Paulet, C.B., commanding the first division; Major-General Russell, C.B., commanding the second division; Lord W. Paulet, G.C.B., Adjutant-General; Sir A. Horsford, the Hon. Colonel Curzon, the Earl of Cavan, Colonel Clifford, Colonel Weatherall, Colonel Gamber, Colonel M'Murdo, Colonel Keane, and Colonel Tyrwhitt.

The Ex-queen of Hawaii was seated within the enclosure, and the Indian Princes on a visit to this country were among the visitors.

The first movement in the long programme was a march past, when they formed in quarter-distance column. The movements began on an attack from the left flank, the object of which was to compel the forces in the direction of Putney, from which it was, of course, inferred that the enemy had been advancing. Skirmishers were accordingly thrown out their skirmishing parties—consisting, in the instance, of the London Rifle Brigade, the 1st Middlesex, battalion of the Hon. Artillery Company, the Middlesex Engineers, the 3rd London, the North Middlesex, South Middlesex, and Westminster—were sent to the front. The enemy, however, was not in that direction, and was supposed to have taken ground on his right, with the view of attacking the flank of the force, a step which would have rendered necessary new formations on the part of the volunteers. All the movements were executed with the utmost precision and steadiness, and in the face of an enemy were gone through: the retiring infantry were protected by their advancing comrades into squares to resist the enemy's cavalry; artillery was brought up to cover the charge on the left centre, and, finally, the position of the enemy on the right was brought up to the front, those of the first passing through to the rear. The skirmishers of the second division were then thrown forward over the ground and for some time kept up a vigorous fire, the small white puffs of smoke from many of the rifles showing that men were telling the marksmen of their whereabouts. The enemy tried to outflank the skirmishers of the first division, but in this the right of the volunteer army on its left, and to prevent this the right of the first division made a forward, so as to attack the enemy on his position in Cæsar's camp. The changes were made quickly and well, the rifle skirmishers taking rather a long time to squares in Turkey while the cavalry charged, and showing excellent knowledge of their drill and manœuvres. The concluding feature in the sham fight consisted in the attempts to drive away the enemy, the force retreated in excellent order.

The sham fight—which, of course, was only intended to begin, the light horse of the Hon. Artillery Company leading. The Duke of Cambridge rode over the ground, himself well mounted, at a good pace, and several were heartily cheered by the public. Lords Bury, Elcho, Ranelagh, and Templetown, Colonels Lindsay and Loyd, and other prominent members of volunteers were greeted with hearty applause, not only in compliment to themselves, but to the steady and unbroken front which was presented by the various corps in saluting-point.

The ground was admirably kept by about 300 men of the A division, who maintained the most perfect order combined with the greatest civility to visitors.

During the sham fight a few accidents occurred. A member of the Hon. Horse Artillery had his horse shot under him, and some gentlemen received painful, though not dangerous, wounds from the rifles of their rear-rank men exploding.

The review on Saturday yesterday week during the display of fireworks. Miss Gifford, a young lady of eighteen, was sitting amid a group of ladies in front of the Royal Box, waiting to witness the spectacle, when one of the mortars used to discharge maroons burst, and a splinter of the shell struck her on the head, causing her a very severe wound. She was immediately taken to Captain Mildmay's tent, where she was attended by Surgeon-Major Hall and the Cobham Surgeon. The wound was too severe to admit of the young lady being removed that night; but she has since been removed to Guyton, where, it is hoped, she will progress favourably.

The following was the distribution of the forces in accordance with the directions of the Field-Marshal Commanding:—

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE VOLUNTEER CAMP AND RIFLE CONTEST AT WIMBLEDON.

AGREEABLY to our custom, we give on the occasion of the annual meeting of the National Rifle Association at Wimbledon, the Portrait of the winner of the Queen's prize, and a picture of the prominent Number, in the successful competition in 1865 for the highest distinction which the marksman has the ambition to win, the name of Sizmore has now to be added to the roll which already comprises Ross, Joplings, Finlay, Roberts, and Wyatt; and the honour, great as it is, of winning the Queen's prize, could not have fallen into worthier hands. A volunteer, we understand, from the beginning; Mr. Sharman, a private in the 6th West York (or Leeds) Rifle Volunteers has been popular for the last six years, and, though more fortunate in his own county, has never yet succeeded in winning any prize at Wimbledon. This year, however, he has amply repaid himself for his previous disappointments, having had the already-reported distinction of being in the first stage of the Albert, as well as having carried off the Queen's prize. He made only 31 points at the 60 yards' range, where he was surpassed by a dozen others; but at the 900 yards he made 35, and at the 1000 yards he made a grand score of 34, out of 35. These figures in succession lie hit the bull's-eye, and he hit it once again, besides making two centres. The highest score to the winner was made by Ensign Black, 22nd Middlesex Queen's Westminster, who made 36 points; Private Davis, Victorian, 38; Sergeant Little, 3rd Gloucestershire, 37; and Private Masseter, 12th Middlesex, 37. Earl Spencer's score was 33. The portrait of Mr. Sharman is from a photograph by Mr. Lafayette, of Dublin and Edinburgh.

The new prize offered by Mr. Horatio Ross for a combined performance of running, loading, and firing, which was described last week, has given rise to some of the most interesting scenes in the proceedings of each day of the Wimbledon meeting. The competition, for this prize, which might be undertaken at any hour of any day, so long as it remained open, is that of a small few to the intending competitor, was always most eagerly watched. We borrow from the Volunteer Service Gazette a brief account of the manner in which this competition is carried on, and from our Engravings. "The competitor, in his 'stocking feet,' having his spiked camaschs in his hand, runs on a circle of 100 yards' circumference, and prepares to fire his first shot. The officer in charge has his watch ready, and as the competitor begins to count the laps he announces, in the case of Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Petrokin, the one who was competing with the latter, who was almost his personal friend, rapidly, from a flask. Meanwhile, his friend has said to him, 'Bull, good shooting. Too much to the right,' as the case may be; and, the loading finished, he runs down to the mark, and then, rising up, is again apprised of the result of his shot, while loading cartridge number two. Having loaded, he takes rifle and loader in the left hand, and starts off like a hare to run round the post fifty yards distant, which is the most to be feared fire another shot. But, while running to the post, he has fished out a bullet from his pocket, and while turning round the post increases speed, enters the bullet into the bore, introduces the head of the ramrod, and is ready to resume his full speed in running back, resuming home the while. The instant he reaches the mantrue he casts himself headlong down on the ground, fires, loads, half leaps, half rolls, is off again up the path. Whenever he comes in his friend tells him 'well in,' as regards time, or 'too long,' if necessary; and, as the five minutes are expired, every shot is almost every time in the bull. The endurance, speed, and skill of hand and eye required in this remarkable match are extraordinary."

Our remaining illustrations of the Wimbledon meeting are scenes of ordinary occurrence during each day's practice. Firing at evening on the lawn in front of Lord Elcho's cottage; the Highland garrison at dinner; and Scottish pipers and foot-races, which attract so much diversion to many of the volunteers and of the ladies and gentlemen who watch their sturdy limbs. The mighty "Jock" members of the Victoria Rifle Corps, fully acquired and armed, going the round of the camp, are struck with strict military precision, an hour or two before the usual bed-time.

The new act for regulating locomotives on turnpike and other roads will come into operation on Sept. 1. Three persons are to work locomotives, and one is to precede with a red flag or notice at a distance of the locomotive. On a turnpike road, or public highway, a locomotive is not to exceed a speed of four miles an hour through a town, and in the city or village at not more than two miles an hour. The act is only to continue in force for two years, but may be renewed as on the expiration of the locomotives in public thoroughfares, both in the metropolis and in the country.

Silver Peak is a prosperous mining camp in the centre of the great mountains at the Iron Mountain of Mississippi is superior to all other iron mountains in the world. Silver Peak is 200 miles from San Francisco, on the west side of the Sierra Nevada, and nearly one degree south of the city of Austin. It is some two miles from Clayton, a Southern Pacific railroad station, and 20 miles from ocean level. Near Silver Peak is an extensive deposit of salt, and not far from it a hill of pure sulphur. In the same country has a "Salton Sea" depression, being quite destitute of vegetation, and bristles with mountains scattered over a plain of pure white salt. Near Silver Peak are "Death Valley" plains of which, since the "49 Spanish trail," travellers have suffered so much, lies but a short distance to the south-east of the village of Silver Peak. Little Salt Lake, in Southern Utah, lies directly east of Silver Peak. At first the mountains were supposed to be composed entirely of silver, but it is now found that the deposits of silver are limited to a few claims, and that the mountains are principally composed of iron. The Nevada Iron Mountain Company, of Arizona, and Virginia city, induced a thorough examination of the west side of the Silver Peak Mountains. This resulted in success, the most brilliant of which is found in the neighbourhood of Austin, on the line of the Nevada Central railroad. The iron ore was sprung up within three years which, Senator Nye says, contains a population of 16,000. From among this line of exploration the miners are eagerly extending their operations, both north and south. Recently (within six months) they came upon this immense deposit near Castle Mount. Twelve claims are staked out, "ledges" as the miners call them, were discovered on that single mountain, and the ore was found to be of such quality as to be considered to be the most valuable yet developed. The specimens—a great number of which have been brought to New York by Colonel Cutherwood—are certainly very remarkable, and merit the attention of the whole financial community. If there is no mistake—and with the specimens actually before us we do not see how there can be—a new deposit, superior even to the Comstock lode, which has furnished so many millions of silver, is about to pour into our market its limitless supply of this precious metal.—New York Journal of Commerce.

THE MIDDLESEX INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL AT FELTHAM.

THE annual inspection of the school established at Feltham, near Hounslow, by the magistrates of the county of Middlesex, under the Act 17 and 18 Victoria, chapter 169, "to make provision for the care, reformation, and education of juvenile offenders," took place on Wednesday week. Any boy of age between seven and fourteen who is convicted of any criminal offence may be committed to this school for a period of not less than one year and not more than three. The school is built and supported entirely at the cost of the county rate. It is governed by a committee of visiting justices, appointed each year by the Court of Quarter Sessions. The number of inmates averages about 360 boys, under the charge of thirty-three resident and thirteen non-resident officers of all grades. The boys are distributed into four sections; each section being composed, when full, of 150 boys, and each section being superintended by one inspector and two labour-masters, with a schoolmaster and assistant schoolmaster for educational purposes. The boys are instructed in farm labour, and in the following industrial occupations—Carpenters', turners', smiths', painters', glaziers', tailors', shoemakers', engineers', gasmakers', bakers', cooks', printers', and bricklayers' work, instrumental music, and any general employment in which they can be made useful. A steamanship class has also just been established. All the linen of the school is washed in the laundry by the boys. The farm is entirely worked by spade labour. All the boots and clothing of the boys are made on the premises, and every boy is obliged to keep his own clothing in good repair. The cost of maintenance and management is at the rate of £20 per head. The inspection was conducted by several of the magistrates and a few other visitors, showed that the school is in a very flourishing state. At the conclusion, during recess of teaching was strictly observed, while the different workshops were also kept busy till the dinner hour; after which the boys were mustered and marched to chapel, headed by the band, and saluting the company as they passed with a flagstaff erected in the centre of the line. Divine worship they were assembled for singing, in the manner shown in our illustration, their vocal performances being directed by the master, who stood on a chair in front of the band. A short address, with other sports and exercises, concluded the proceedings of the day.

WRECK OF THE MAIL-STEAMER ATHENS, AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

THE tremendous storm which visited the Cape of Good Hope on the 17th of May, destroying almost every vessel that it caught in Table Bay, has already been mentioned; we now give an illustration of the wreck of the mail-steamer Athens, belonging to the United Navigation Company, which was carried broadside upon the rocks, at Green Point, where the lighthouses, while endeavouring to steam out of the bay, when all her anchors had parted. She had been making signals of distress all day; but it was impossible to help her. It was seven o'clock in the evening when she was driven upon the rocks, when her very rigidity broke up. The calls for help from those on board could be distinctly heard upon the shore, amid the roar of the breakers; but there was not a rope or lanyard at the lighthouse, nor was any rockets or Manby apparatus, and for two hours a continued wail of anguish was spread for help came from the steamer, which rolled occasionally he seen lying on the rocks, broken-backed, but still above water, with masts standing, until after nine o'clock. Fragments of wreck, floating ashore then bore testimony that the ship was rapidly breaking up. About ten o'clock the cries ceased, and thick darkness gathered over the scene. Nothing remained of the vessel except her engines and boilers, which have been carried some distance from the place at which she is believed to have originally struck, and nearer to the Mesille Point Lighthouse. All the way from the reef to the breakwater the shore is strewn with fragments of wreck; even the seats and yards have been snapped into short lengths; and the lightest portions of the ship have been blown inland and made unrecognisable. Next morning two bodies were recovered, both very much bruised from pounding against the rocks, and both were identified, with the exception of under-drawers, showing that, before taking their final plunge, the unhappy men had calmly prepared themselves for a last struggle for life. There were no passengers on board; but the master, Captain D. Smith, Dr. J. Heath Curtis, the medical officer, Messrs. C. Dewar, T. Bain, and three engineers, and twenty-five other persons made up the list of the officers and crew; and there is no doubt that they all perished.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE NEW BRIDGE AT BLACKFRIARS.

THE Engraving on our front page is an illustration of the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the new bridge at Blackfriars, which was performed, by the Lord Mayor of London, on Thursday week. It took place in a huge cofferdam on the south side of the river, where a row of piles, driven closely together, and the space within excluded like the side of a ship, formed a solid bulwark against the water. Massive timbers, known as rams ran across the cofferdam at one place, and, being arranged for use, with no eye to uniformity, gave the whole structure a business-like, practical look, which any attempt at ornament could get rid of. Whatever could be done in the decoration of these temporary materials was done. The rams, piles, and banners by the hundred, tastefully disposed, and as much of the rough timber and the mud as could be got rid of made an orderly and conveniently cut it was covered with baize or coloured cloth. At the bottom of the dam, some 19 ft. below low-water mark, was placed the foundation-stone—a block of Cornish granite, measuring about a yard and a quarter, neatly "dressed" for the occasion. The stone itself is not new to the site, for it has formerly been placed in exactly the water stone in one of the piers of the old bridge, having been placed there when the bridge first became affected by the action of the water, for which it has since required incessant and expensive support. Except when the stone was placed, the floor of the cofferdam was planked over and well supported, and overboard were tiers of galleries with benches, to which the invited guests were ever ready to ascend. The Common Council, in their robes and furnished with wands and emblems of their office, at half-past two o'clock by the river, and were followed by the other civic dignitaries, having come in procession from Guildhall, with a band playing the National Anthem, arrived at the site. The Lord Mayor was conducted to a chair of state placed in front of the foundation-stone, where the Lady Mayoress (Miss Hale) was already seated. He was surrounded by the other members of the functionaries in their robes of office, and the formal ceremony then began. The secretary of the Bridge-house Estates Committee presented took their stations by the side of the stone, Mr. William Webster beating the plate with the implements of his craft. Then the purse containing the coins to be deposited, Mr. Deputy Tegg the glass vessel to hold the coins, Mr. T. B. Simpson, and the Lord Mayor the Thomas Parker the level. The other members of the committee are—Mr. Alderman, Mr. Deputy Hawtrey; Mr. Alderman William Lawrence, M.P.; Mr. John Paterson, M.P.; Mr. Alderman Sir J. Marratt, Mr. John Kelday, Mr. H. H. Heath, and Mr. C. Robinson. The architect, Mr. Joseph Cubitt and Mr. Webster, the trowel and mortar, and the engineer, Mr. Cubitt first exhibited the general plans and drawings of the bridge. The inscriptions, in Latin and English, were read in a loud voice by the clerk of the bridge-house estate, the Rev. Dr. Mortimer, who composed them, the English being as follows:—

The former Bridge over the River Thames having fallen into decay, the Court of Common Council of the City of London ordered the construction of a new Bridge, and the Right Honourable Sir Thomas Chitty, Knight, Lord Mayor, 1864, laid the First Stone on the 25th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1865; we trust under better auspices, for the former stone which we built during a period of General War, was destroyed by fire. The work undertaken in a time of profound Peace, in the 29th year of the reign of Queen Victoria, by the consent when the former Bridge was considered to be too narrow for the increasing traffic, by the adoption of Free Trade, those separate interests which divided nations have been brought into unity, and the Thames, the source of His infinite goodness, grant to the onus a happy conclusion. Joseph Cubitt, Engineer.

The English translation was received with cheers, and then the Lord Mayor placed in the glass vessel a number of coins of the following coins:—A sovereign and a half-sovereign in gold; a crown, a half-crown, a florin, a shilling, a sixpence, a fourpenny-piece, a threepenny-piece, and a penny-piece in silver; and a penny, a half-penny, and a farthing in bronze. The glass vessel was next sealed up by Mr. Cubitt, and the Lord Mayor deposited it in the stone. The stone prepared for its reception, along with a copy of the Times of that day, one of the inscriptions and a set of the programme, a photograph of Lord Mayor Hale, and one of the ancient engraving, noticed elsewhere, which represents the laying of the foundation-stone of the old bridge in 1760. The Chairman of the Bridge Committee then presented the Lord Mayor with a handsome silver trowel, and expressed the desire of the committee that his Lordship should lay the foundation-stone of the new bridge. Assenting to this request, the Lord Mayor spread the mortar with the trowel in workman-like fashion, and the stone was then lowered to its place, which was not more than one foot below its former level. His Lordship then made a few appropriate remarks, took the mallet and level, with which he adjusted and set the stone, striking it three times with the mallet, and declaring it, amid loud cheers, to be well and truly laid. The stone stored and space of the City were then placed crosswise upon the stone, the band played "Rule Britannia," following this up with the National Anthem, the procession started on its return to Guildhall, and the ceremony was concluded.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF OLD BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE IN 1760.

MR. R. W. MYLNE, grandson of the Mr. Robert Mylne who was the architect of old Blackfriars Bridge, has allowed us to publish a reduced copy of an old Engraving in his possession, copies of which were given away, on Monday week, at a public reception given by alderman when they met to lay the foundation-stone of the new bridge, as shown in our Illustration on our front page. A copy was also deposited in the cavity of the stone. The Engraving shows the performance of a similar ceremony a hundred and five years ago, when the foundation-stone of the old bridge was laid by Sir Thomas Chitty, then Lord Mayor, who is seen with raised mallet about to strike the stone, upon which the trowel and mortar of the masonry are laid. In the right-hand corner is the Recorder, addressing the architect, Mr. Mylne, who stands beside a plan of the Old Bridge. A cannon is firing, in dangerous proximity to the heads of the by-standers, but only one person is visible receiving injury. Mr. W. Mylne supplies the following particulars of this affair:—"The laying of an inauguration stone on the City side of the river by Sir Thomas Chitty, in 1760, before the expiration of his mayoralty, was considered so desirable that, although no permanent works had been commenced, it was decided to have a great public ceremony, and for that object a special excavation was made in front of the old wharf-wall adjoining the mouth of the River Fleet, to the west of the ancient causeway or public ferry landing-place, at the top of the Fleet Ditch. Four large timbered blocks were fixed on a platform, over which a stone, 6 ft. by 3 ft., was placed, having a hole, 12 in. by 9 in., for medals and silver objects, besides a plate of tin bearing an inscription. This inauguration-stone was laid on the last day of October, 1760, and was securely fixed with fourteen iron cramps, dovetailed and leaded; and, subsequently, two additional blocks were fixed to prevent the possibility of its being disturbed, the total cost being £185. Of the medals therein, it is said, is one that, in the enthusiasm of the moment, the architect took from his neck and threw into the cavity of the stone. It should be mentioned, in explanation, that this was a prize silver medal, the first of those won by an undergraduate, when a student at Luke's Academy, in Dublin, and, being set in a copper rim, bearing a Latin inscription relative to the occasion, was deposited in the form in the cavity, where it will no doubt be found among the other relics."

Diplomatic relations between the Brazilian and British Governments will be re-established at an early date. It is understood that the Government of Brazil has accepted the explanations made by our Ministers, and that then the last obstacle to the renewal of the amity between countries has been removed. The exact terms of the treaties have not been received.

The King of Siam has ordered the re-organisation of his army, and has resolved on adopting a system of conscription, by which 10,000 men will be annually added to the military force. Those recruits are intended to act against the Cambodians, who have recently invaded and devastated the province. A few months back three marauders appeared in the Gulf of Siam with fifty pirates and murdered the Governor of Chantaboon, and sacked the capital.

The party of Royal Engineers from the Ordnance Survey, which left Southampton for the Channel Islands on the 13th of September, for the purpose of making a survey of Jersualem, and levelling the line of railway from St. Helier's to the Devil's Hole, returned to Jersey and arrived in England. The depression of the surface of the Dead Sea, which has been the subject of much discussion and controversy, as to its extent, was discovered to be 1292 ft.

The earthquake of the 12th inst. a shock of earthquake visited the town of Milan, in Syria, and its environs. The shock was felt in a direction nearly directing, and was accompanied by strong subterranean noise, which continued for about three seconds. Another shock was experienced the next morning, at a quarter to ten o'clock, but was weaker than that of the previous night. Shocks were likewise felt, on the same day, at about the same hour, in Sterling and Kilmadock, in Perthshire, and, on the 13th, at two minutes past six in the evening, at Flintshield, having a north-easterly direction. The shock was accompanied by a rumbling noise, and continued for the space of seven seconds. Slight shocks were also felt at

THE ELECTION.

WITH the return of the members for the far-off northern Irish county of Antrim the general election of 1865 was brought to a close, in the middle of the past week. Looking to the noisy, hostile, and tumultuary proceedings which have prevailed with unprecedented unanimity, and which, in some places, rose to such a height that they were only to be quelled by charges of cavalry and the dangerous intimidation of the rifles of infantry, it is just a question whether an argument has not been supplied for shortening the duration of Parliaments. It would seem as if the whole of the elector, and still more the constituency, lost a great deal of that spirit of freedom which is conceived to be a very important element in the social system. It has been put up during a long Parliament of more than six years, for the purpose of returning members to Parliament is to be signalised by wild license of excitement and action, and the gravest operation of a free people is to be converted into a Saturnalia, it is possible that a more frequent recurrence to the polls of the country might tend to clear the arbour with which the said people appear to have thrown themselves into the proceedings of the last few months. It is not to be said by any of what class of persons the crowds who assemble at elections are composed, for it hardly possible that the whole shouting multitude can consist—to use a cant word at this moment—of the mere "roughs;" and it is not a violent presumption to hold that some of them rise to six-pound houses. If so, perhaps it may be taken that the exhibition of physical supplementing moral force which has become remarkable during the election, may be a way of asking for a vertical extension of the franchise; and, in that sense, we commend the experience of the last three weeks to practical and also to philosophical Parliamentary reformers.

The incidents of the latest elections have been, on the whole, interesting, and in many cases important. There is no doubt that in the counties the curious new Conservative reaction—which the phrase astonished but not daunted Mr. Disraeli, who has so satisfactorily made out that the Conservatives have better position than ever it was—has continued to prevail; but, on the other hand, there have been some Liberal victories of importance. Notably, in Inspite to the contest, three to three, like that of the Hewitt and Curzon, ended in the return of the Liberal candidates. It was naturally thought that what he had been the victim of bad management, which sought to thrust on Viscount Uffington, a young nobleman, who exhibited himself on the hustings as a decidedly weak Conservative point of view, between himself and Mr. Pleydell Bouverie, the old Liberal member. The result between the two leading the new candidate fell, and besides brought the stools to the ground with him. The solidity of the Liberal interest in Inspite from being the son-in-law of Lord Overstone outweighed the power of Printing House-square. Mr. Bouverie, however, was more than a match for Mr. Bouverie, who is no longer young, and is feebler in body even than his years would warrant. Mr. Bouverie, however, had no terrible opponent personally in Viscount Uffington; and, in short, the election was betting-book reasoning. The no practical and skilful administrator as Sir William Clayton was personally to fill the office of one of the candidates, and therefore might be supposed to have had something to do with the arrangements. In Essex the good fight fought by Mr. R. B. Baker, in the Liberal interest, was not successful, and Mr. Round, the Liberal Leader, and brother of the new Lord Cranbourne, not, judging from some of his antecedents, opposite to him in ability and acquirements as well as in blood preserved the Conservative unity; but in the northern division of the hitherto impregnable Conservative breach was made by the introduction of Sir Thomas Western, who not only won a Liberal seat, but ousted Major Beresford, the most representative of Tories. And so Mr. Du Cane will have to fret—which he is likely to do—at being coupled with a Liberal dead-weight, as he, of course, will conceive it. The struggle in Mid Surrey, in the new seven; the numbers of the respective forces was carefully arranged for effect. Mr. Gathorne Hardy, with the Bonchurch influence, and the Oxford fresh upon him, came forward to propose the new candidate, Mr. Hart Dyke; and Mr. Locke King, and Mr. Watson, both recently returned for the county town of Kent, assisted the Liberal candidates in their support. The Liberals were not on par fas et nefas; for forgery was imported into the proceedings by the Conservatives of the party. Lord Holmesdale and Mr. Dyke were showing as victors, there was a row with Sir John Lubbock, the Liberal chairman, who has since manfully used because he endeavoured to let it appear that he knew of no one among his supporters who could be guilty of such an act. The result of this disturbance Mr. Augerstein, who sat for Greenwich in the last Parliament, or the wrong side of the house, and who had retired upon the hustings on the row, vide, one of Mr. Gladstone in South Lancashire. In two days he was his seat and lost his wretched Greenwich. Mr. Walter is pledged to South Northamptonshire there was good hope that a Liberal would have come in, but the Conservative cause was, in the gentleman member, who has a notion that his destined duty in the House is to intervene on critical moments and settle vexed questions in an ex cathedra fashion, and who seems, like the poet Gray, not to be able to open his mouth without an if or an or, unless he is fully dressed. However, Lord Frederick Fitzroy, who left Thetford, which he recently represented, to try his luck for a county seat, was baffled, and the old member was returned. Of course neither could wish that North Warwickshire would reject Mr. Newdegate, because he is unique as a member of Parliament, and as a Parliamentary man in some sort a merit; but it may have been hoped, upon other than political grounds, that Mr. Newdegate would be ousted Mr. Bromley Davenport, who was, perhaps, the most unconsciously grotesque M.P. of the late House. However, there was a reason why he is pleasant in the eyes of the electors of North Warwickshire (what was it Dr. Parr said about Warwickshire?) and he was returned, and they honouring party, and party and personality stand as they did in that county.

According to Mr. Disraeli, it was the instinct of the most dangerous and irresistible kind that placed Mr. Cowper at the head of the poll in Hertfordshire. This part of the Right Hon. Baronet's speech was applauded to the echo in the world meant all the potter he made about losing such a colleague as Mr. Abel Smith. Did any one, out of Hertfordshire, ever hear of any other district of it, gentleman during the whole time, from 1854 till now, that he had represented Hertfordshire. And yet Mr. Bulwer has been no pachetic over his loss as ever Milton was over that of Lycidas. It may be that the reason that he is not like Mr. Smith that has been retained from Parliament by the process of a general election, is, North Wilts, the Liberal who won was born in Scotland. For Charles Bruce has topped Sir George Jenkinson, although Mr. R. P. Long has been returned for the county by his father, leaving Mr. Campbell, his former seat, and he will endeavour to supply to his leader the "pleasant presence of Walter Long" at his side. Talking of Long reminds us that Mr. Morrit has turned that Mr. Morrit—manly and county, bluff and pleasant gentleman—cedes his seat for the North Riding to Sir Henry Marwood Boynton, Mr. W. G. Duncombe, one of the white-waistcoat orators—persons familiar with the house know what this implies—retains his "double" in the representation of the West Riding the Liberal candidates won both seats, and the Fitzwilliam interest again appears in Parliament represented by Lord Milton, in this case a remarkable man, having developed qualities which, in a son of Lord Fitzwilliam, are unexpected. Sir Edward Kerrison's seat, in East Suffolk, is not vacated by the Liberals of one vote. Again, in South Derbyshire, Mr. Evans, who sat for the county, goes back, taking with him Mr. Colville, who was formerly its representative, leaving the late Conservative member, Mr. Mundy, in the lurch. The contests in West Norfolk, North Hants, and South Warwickshire terminated in favour of the Conservatives, though Mr. Gurdon, Sir H. Mildmay, and Lord Duncan respectively made good fights. The chronicle of the English elections may be closed by a simple statement that in the Isle of Wight, as it were under the shadow of the Palace, into which Sir Charles Locock has a special privilege of entrée; he was, because no doubt a high Tory, beaten by Sir J. Simeon, a Liberal and a Roman Catholic, so that now that religious body has three representatives—for English constituencies in Parliament instead of one, as hitherto.

The only Scottish election which deserves special notice is that for Haddingtonshire, and that mainly because of the singular demeanour of Lord Elcho at the declaration of the poll. It would seem that the noble Lord, in his haste, thought that he was in Wimbledon, and he is accustomed to play very fantastic tricks, which are not always acceptable there, his indulgence in his taste for chaffing having before now rather annoyed some of the volunteers for whom, in delivering prizes which they have gained, he has spoken in a way which took off all the grace and all the triumph of the moment. As regards his proceedings in Haddingtonshire, it can only be supposed that by a long continuance of office he has still never be under the necessity of asking the suffrages of that constituency again. There were some hopes that a great Liberal victory would have been gained by the ejection of Colonel Taylor, "whipper-in-in-chief" to the Opposition, in the country of Dalkeith, though in-in-chief" to the Opposition, in the country of Dalkeith, though in the assault on one of the seats was serious, his stems not to have been ever in peril, and Mr. Hamilton, his colleague hitherto, is his colleague still. Probably not even those burnished up to the most votes will care much that Mr. M'Mahon loses his seat for Wexford County; because Sir Colman Rice, who is returned, is of cognate principles, Liberal, and perhaps less uncertain, on a division, to the Government. The return of Mr. Dickson for Sligo county of Louth was never in question, though Mr. Kennedy had to struggle severely to preserve the seat which he acquired at a great Liberal victory from the vigorous assault of Mr. M'Clintock. Two of the elections for Irish counties will cause remarkable affects on the personnel of the new House of Commons. The county of Cork has rejected Mr. Vincent Scully; and in the event it was discovered that Mr. Pope Hennessy, after its having been supposed that he was returned, was rejected by the King's County by six votes. Much might be said upon these two incidents, but we must content us with offering our hearty congratulations to the Speaker of the future, whoever he may be, and, most of all, to that right hon. gentleman who in the last two Parliaments has filled the chair, and who, of all men, will appreciate the value of that unpretending post.

The practical result of the election may be summed up in a few words. Of the total number of 658 members returned to the new House of Commons, 367 rank as Liberals and 290 as Conservatives. In the chances and chances of the elections there are lost and gained thirty-three seats and gained fifty-seven. There has been one double return—that of Mr. Gathorne Hardy for the University of Oxford and Lancashire: and in the case (the county of Dumbarton) the candidates polled an equal number of votes. At present the House is an undigested mass; and, until a Speaker is elected, and the members are sworn in, this constitutional country is without a constitutional Government.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Lord Dalhousie's Indian Administration. By Sir Charles Jackson. (Smith, Elder, and Co.) Definition is notoriously difficult, and he who attempts to define frequently ends in a confusion worse than that of confusion has been defined as "one who discharges archidiconal functions"; and a prelate who would define the limits between archdeaconry and heterodoxy, could find none better than "archdeacon is my deary, and heterodoxy is everybody else." But what is, then, is your impartial historian? Is he not one who takes your view of history? Is he not one who, thereby, in Sir Charles Jackson decrees partiality, or something worse, in Mr. Kaye's, Mr. Arnold's, and Major Bell's remarks upon "Lord Dalhousie's Indian Administration." This is not the place to praise or blame Lord Dalhousie's measures whatever were his merits and his failings, there can be no doubt but that his Indian career was brilliant, and that he fell a victim, perhaps, to the best of his ability at the sacrifice of his life. Such a man deserves the respect and gratitude of his countrymen, and the most complete exposition of his Indian administration contained in this volume is honourable to Sir Charles Jackson, and calls for grateful notice. It is not, however, within the term misgovernment to the government of Lord Dalhousie.

Gone and Considered. By Miss Jackson. (Longmans.) A diary, for the most part, of a sojourn in India during portions of 1857-8. They were eventful years, but the events recorded have had but little to do with the stirring events and to have mixed not much in the thrilling scenes. Her experiences are chiefly of sunstrokes, dysentery, fever, vermin, &c. Her observations are those of a lady who has been written about the years of the nutrity, is somewhat tame.

The Bubble of Finance. By Sir John Barrow, Bart. (Low, Son, and Marston.) A reprint of articles from All the Year Round. The articles showed up with rather more than usual force the commercial knowledge than the common run of men with a little common sense might, from a slight acquaintance with the world and the contents of the newspapers, have easily acquired, the ways in which scoundrels make, and fools lose, money. The sophisticated may probably gape amazed over the book, which has appropriate, though not original, interest set off with a suitable sketch of a man blowing bubbles and geese flying after them; but it is not such people who require instruction, but humour.

Excursions in France and Switzerland. By the Rev. G. F. Browne, M.A. (Longmans.) It is a relief to turn from high ice to low ice, from the plateau whence our countrymen are precipitated by many thousands of feet to death to the glaciers which must be sought beneath the earth. Mr. Browne, from his very extensive travels, twelve ice-caves which he visited in person, and gives, "from various sources, accounts of similar caves in other parts of the world." Incidents of travel are interspersed, to moisten descriptive dryness, amongst the details of the narrative; but the details are themselves singular enough to deserve attention.

Successful and Precious Stones. By Harry Emanuel, F.R.G.S. (J. C. Hotten.) A book to make the mouth water, and the eyes water. The author has compiled, with, apparently, much diligence and exactness, a work, embellished with numerous illustrations and engravings, upon a subject which is said to have (especially for Christian men, who are united by the same spirit) the effect to make themselves "with bridoned hair and pearls") great interest for all mankind who have not too philosophical a mind to care for the pearls of this wicked world. From the diamond to the agate, all precious stones, with their history, value, and "the most approved processes with simple tests for their identification," are treated of. It is recommended to all who, after the manner of the Jews, gather together in their minds their diamonds, their deeats, and their daughters.

Society in Paris. Transcribed from the French. (E. and F. N. Spon.) This volume contains a series of learned and interesting papers, accompanied by elaborate diagrams, upon "fast," "the manufacture of coralpins," "the use of the Cornish pump," "the use of the Archimedean wheels," "the road bridges of the Charing-cross Railway," "the Charing-cross Railway-bridge over the Thames," "the sewerage of the Erith and the repair of the river bank," and "the supply of water to towns." The subjects, it will be seen, are of the most practical and concern other besides scientific people.

Supernatural Facts in the Life of the Rev. John Babcock Feyrouse, A.M., LL.D. Edited by T. L. Nichols, M.D. (F. Pitman.) Mr. Ferguson, it should be mentioned, is the possessor of a sort of "spiritual" father towards the "Brothers Davenport," whose endeavours to lighten the pockets of the public by miraculous agency do not appear to have been very successful. It is not, we may perhaps add, to know more about him, they would do well to consult this book. At page 112 they will read that "a gentleman poured a glass of spirits into a tumbler and held it under the table. The tumbler appeared to be touched, and moved as if some one was drinking from it; when the tumbler was brought into the light the liquid had vanished." This singular phenomenon—the disappearance of spirituous liquor from a tumbler—may be frequently observed in the case of corporeal beings; and, though it "was repeated three times" upon the occasion referred to, it certainly "does not follow . . . that invisible beings drink." It will appear probable, however, that somebody drank.

Hardy Fenn. By Nona Bellairs. (Smith, Elder, and Co.) A graceful little book upon a graceful subject. From its elegant frontispiece to its last page it is worthy of its simple but beautiful theme. It is pleasant to follow our gentle guide to the spots whence she gathers her ferns, and pleasanter still to hear her tell of the sceptical under which they were gathered.

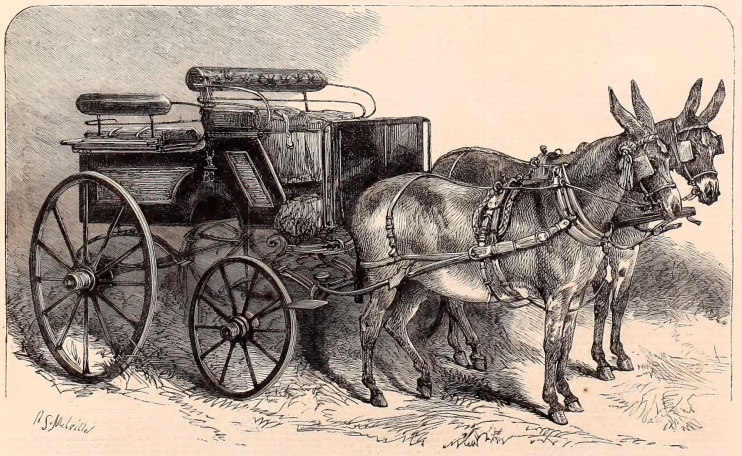
OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

PRINCE FREDERICK OF SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

His Highness Prince Frederick Emilius Augustus of Schleswig-Holstein, Prince de Noer, and Count of Rantzau, was born on the 6th of January, 1800, at Augustenburg, in the island of Alsen, and was therefore in his sixty-sixth year. He was the second son of Prince Christian, Grand Duke of Schleswig-Holstein Augustenburg, and was brother of the late Duchess of Kent, and cousin-german to the present Queen. His eldest brother, Christian Frederick Sonderburg, and was brother of Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, Princess Royal of Denmark and Queen of Sweden, was born on the 23rd of August, 1803, and married, on the 17th of September, 1829, Princess Louise Caroline Juliana, daughter of Prince Joseph of Hesse, and in September, 1848, he leaves a son, Prince Frederick, born in 1830, and a daughter, Princess Louise.

LORD FRANCIS DOUGLAS.



Lord Francis William Bouverie Douglas, who perished, with three others, on the 5th inst., by the upsetting of a pleasure-boat in the Lake of Lugano in descending Monte Caroina, in Switzerland, in his 34th year, was the younger son of the late Sholto John, fifteenth Earl of Morton, by Frances Sidney, daughter of Sir William Clayton, Bart., and was next brother and heir presumptive of John Sholto, eighth and present Marquis of Queensberry. He was born Oct. 8, 1831. The accident which caused his death was in itself so remarkable that the minute narrative given by Mr. Wrench, Chaplain at Zermatt, becomes a deeply interesting record of the sad event. Mr. M'Cormick mentions Lord Francis as having arrived at Visp on Wednesday afternoon to second the Matterhorn this season. Before leaving England, he invested his property in the purchase of a pleasure-boat, which, Mr. Wrench said, he agreed to accompany him on his expedition. On arriving at Zermatt, on Thursday, they found that the ascent of the Matterhorn had not yet been made, and had been considered by the Matterhorn guides as the utmost attempts to do so. They agreed to work together. Mr. Birkbeck and I were both previously from other guides, Peter Perrin, Douglas, who had answered successful ascents this season, and had been with Mr. Whymper for a few days previously; and Mr. Birkbeck, who had made high mountains with Mr. Hudson, were allowed to go with them. Having secured the services of Michel Croz, one of the best of the Chamonix guides, and of Peter Taugwald, his son, they started on the expedition on Thursday morning. That night they slept on the Hörnli ridge, at a height of 10,000 feet. They began the ascent by the rocks on the left of the ridge. They met with no great difficulty, and reached the summit at 1.40 p.m. on Friday. The descent was commenced by the same route by which they had ascended. Mr. Birkbeck and I agreed to accompany him on his expedition. PRIZE DONKEYS, THE PROPERTY OF MISS BURDETT COUTTS.

THE ring at the Islington Agricultural Hall has just had "an entire change of performance," as the playbills have it. In the place of the beautifully moulded Derby winner of 1862, we have had "the performing donkey by the celebrated donkey Caractacus;" and Lord Clifden, who proved himself a second Eclipse when his horses skipped him nearly 120 yards at the St. Leger start, has had to yield to "Mr. Napper's Black Jack, the undoubted champion of England." In short, "blue-ribbon winners" and 500-guinea hunters have departed, and mules and "moke" (as the costermongers term their donkeys), with all their strange attendant sprites, have been in full possession. Tom Sayers's mule has found a lad to ride it at last, and the most remarkable saddle and chariot races have been held in the ring, the riders or drivers being dressed in calico jockey attire. No whips were allowed, and two officers from the Society for the Suppression of Cruelty to Animals were present to support Mr. Douglas, and to impound all whips and spurs. There was very little need for them, as most of the donkeys were in beautiful condition, and stepped out wonderfully to the well-known rattle of the rein and shake of the feet. Miss Burdett's donkey pair, Polly and Tommy—a five and six year old—took a prize. They were driven round the ring in a small four-wheeler, and made a very pretty turnout with their neat harness and blue-and-black rosettes. One of them was, we believe, purchased at this exhibition last year. The munificent patron of the show was received very cordially by the crowd when she was seen in the boxes on Friday afternoon. The prizes were given away shortly after her arrival, and addresses were delivered by the Bishop of London, Mr. Gurney, and the Rev. Thomas Jackson.

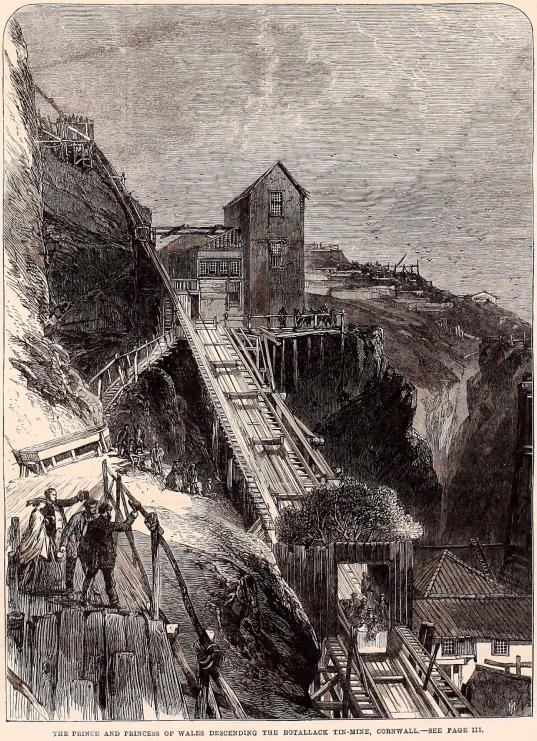
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.



No. 1327.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE HOLIDAYS.

THE country has passed abruptly into profound political quiet. An interesting rather than exciting Session, followed by the turmoil of a general election, has carried us sooner, perhaps, and more suddenly than we were prepared for into a perfect calm. For several years past the stream of public affairs down which we have been borne has been, almost without exception, troubled enough to keep alive anxiety, and occasionally to awaken a sense of imminent danger. Ever since that memorable New-Year's Day when the Emperor Napoleon startled the world with the utterance of a few words of reproach and menace to the Austrian Ambassador until within a week or two back we have had a succession of incidents, the nature of which was more or less calculated to inspire in us a feeling of uneasiness. The war in Italy, the Villafranca convention, the expeditions of Garibaldi to Sicily, so different in their respective issues, the struggles and death agony of Poland, the military invasion of Schleswig-Holstein and the dismemberment of the little kingdom of Denmark, the civil contest in America, the affair of the Trent, the collapse of manufacturing industry in the north-west caused by the cotton famine, a bad harvest or two, and more than one monetary crisis, have followed so closely one upon another, or have so intermingled their disturbing influences, that for six long years we seem hardly to have known what it was to be entirely at our ease. And now, all at once, we find ourselves, after having been hurried down the rapids of a severe electoral strife, in still water, with an unclouded political sky from the horizon to the zenith, and with a prospect of prosperity, plenty, and contentment unshaded enough to assure, for the present at least, the most nervous and mistrustful. There is scarcely a breath to distend our sails, or a motive strong enough to make us ply our oars. We float lazily along upon a languid and nearly imperceptible current; and, leaving public affairs to take care of themselves awhile, we give our thoughts free license to take a spell of recreation.

In truth, "the holidays" have set in this year with unusual intensity. There is nothing, absolutely nothing, to crook about. There are lulls, we all know, which can only be regarded as forerunners of a storm. The present lull is not the least like one of that character. Of course, it may be succeeded, and very soon too, by a totally unexpected hurricane of public excitement. But it has nothing ominous in it. It is not unnatural. It is not oppressive. It suggests nothing extraordinary as about to happen. It makes no appeal to our apprehension. It does not, in the remotest degree, resemble that awful hush of the elements which bids men hasten to a secure place of shelter. It is more like the divine quiet of a summer's eve. All its accessories and accompaniments promise a settled tranquillity. Abroad there is no symptom of disturbance. Whether we look east or west, to Europe or to America, we can detect nothing likely to involve us in dangerous or even perplexing embarrassment. Outward events correspond with inward disposition; and, having convinced ourselves that a meddling foreign policy is neither the noblest nor the wisest for this country to adopt, it happens very opportunely that there is nothing which presents the smallest temptation to meddle. At home, affairs invite even more pressingly to the dismissal of present care. It will probably be a full half-year before the new Parliament is summoned to "dispatch of business." Money is easy. Trade expands. The weather has been singularly seasonable. The harvest promises well. We cannot find anything in the national condition that should reasonably check the outflow of present contentment. We enter upon "the holidays" with everything around us congruous to a hearty enjoyment of them.

What can journalists do better at such a time than let their comments and criticisms harmonise with the situation? Men's thoughts—to say nothing of women's—are then filled with familiesscene to prove their seamanship by yachting—some to exercise their patience in fishing—and all to inhale fresh vigour with the cool salt breeze. There is a rush to every description of bathing-place, in order that the physical rust and dust of the year may be thoroughly washed out—in most cases, not before there was need of it. "Bygone dull care!" is the motto of the season, and happily, as far as politics are concerned, the command is obeyed. The swing of public affairs is so easy, so free from all counteracting influence, that it reminds us of the "sleep" of a top when it spins most perfectly—there is movement, but it is practicable. May it also for a long time be uninterrupted, at any rate until November, the month famous for shooting-stars and for Cabinet Councils! For presently the moors will offer their attractions to sportsmen, and the round of field sports will open on the eve of "breaking up and going away." They have laid aside their cares with their graver duties. They are anticipating their interval of pleasurable relaxation. The sea invites them—to enjoy the dolce far niente which their families consume and enfeebling confinement.

The Cabinet has been remodelled. The Ministry of Finance has been reorganised and divided into two departments, one of which will be intrusted with the financial administration of the country and the other with the preparation of the Budget. The Ministry of Marine is abolished, and the duties of it (not many) are divided between the departments of War and Commerce. Herr von Schmerling becomes President of the Supreme Court of Justice; Dr. Hein, late Minister of Justice, is appointed President of the Supreme Financial Court of Vienna. Count Belcredi is Minister of State for the non-Hungarian provinces.

The new Ministry has opened its administration by an act of clemency and liberality which augurs well for its popularity and prudence. An Imperial decree was issued granting a pardon to all offenders against the press laws, and ordering pending prosecutions to be stopped and remitted. Journalists cannot be sent to gaol for any of those new undergoing imprisonment.

The terms on which Austria is ready to concur with Prussia for the settlement of the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty have been made public. The Cabinet of Vienna is willing to let her ally take Kiel and occupy Rendsburg, provided she gives Austria a free hand in the shape of a rectification of the Silesian frontier. The Administration claims of Prussia in the Duchies will be left to the decision of their future Duke, and for this shorn dignity Prussia proposes the Grand Duke of Oldenburg. The Prussian Landtag has been hastily prorogued, and is not at any future time to revert to the scheme of annexation—to ask the people of the Duchies whether they would adopted the Government of their own Government is the last thing in the thoughts of either of the two Cabinets.

Austria has made a formal protest against the arrest made by the Prussian military authorities of Dr. May, and against the expulsion of Herr Twiss from Holstein.

ITALY.

King Victor Emmanuel has arrived in the Alpine valley of Aosta, where he means to spend the whole of August.

RUSSIA.

From St. Petersburg the intelligence comes that the Russians, under General Tchernayeff, have captured Tashkend, a town of about 40,000 inhabitants in the heart of Independent Turkestan, with but trifling loss. In July the occupation of the place will be made provisional.

The Government is reported to have it in contemplation to grant some rights to the Jews in the eastern parts of the empire, where they have hitherto had none. The object is to encourage commerce, by which, in that quarter of the world, the Jews alone seem to have an aptitude.

UNITED STATES.

The election at Richmond has resulted in the success of the Secession ticket, the Union party polling a minority.

The New Jersey Republican Convention has nominated Mr. L. Ward for Governor, and unanimously adopted the policy of President Johnson's policy and the amendment abolishing slavery, and also the resolutions of the Union Convention recently held at Philadelphia to denounce doctrine. A resolution in favour of negro suffrage was defeated by a large majority.

Formidable guerrilla bands continue to infest the Teche district of Louisiana.

The Provisional Governor of South Carolina, Mr. Parry, has issued a Union proclamation announcing the election of a State Convention to meet on the 13th of September.

General Lee, who is now as a country residence in Charlotte County, Virginia, is engaged in writing a history of his campaigns.

THE ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE ANNUAL CONGRESS.

This very interesting meeting began at Dorchester, on Tuesday. The principal object of attraction, besides ancient remains, was the county chamber, in the Guildhall, was opened as a reception-room, where Mr. Durnell, the Mayor, and the Corporation, with the Local Committee of the meeting took place, at the Townhall, on Tuesday afternoon, when there was a very large attendance. The President, Lord Talbot de Malahide, in his opening address, said the Institute had been founded in 1844, and had now 1,200 members. He referred to the numerous objects of interest in the county of Dorchester. The temporary museum at the Infant School-Room, with its rare, ancient, and curious objects, was then visited by the party. At the evening meeting, presided over by Sir John P. Bodkins, Mr. F. H. Fortier gave a lecture on the Early History of Dorchester. The Rev. Mr. Barnes and Mr. Watterson, and several other gentlemen, also addressed the meeting. On Wednesday the whole party will be brought up and the concluding meeting held at noon. An addition has been made to the list of places to be visited on Wednesday next. Mr. J. H. Parker has invited the members and their friends to Wells, for the purpose of examining the Cathedral there.

Next week we shall give (with illustrations) a precis of the entire proceedings of the meeting, which promises to be among the most interesting of the season.

The Aborigines Protection Society have memorialised the Queen on the New Zealand question, praying that a commission of inquiry might be established to inquire into the Gisborne affair, and on the ground that such a step would only lead to further complications.

Many gentlemen of the Stock Exchange entertained therewith, the mansion of Lord Overstone, in Park-lane, have subscribed and presented a handsome service of plate to Mr. Scott, in acknowledgment of the many disinterested services of that gentleman in London, as an acknowledgment of "his untiring zeal and great courtesy on all occasions, and his readiness to assist the members."

In our obituary notice, last week, of the Prince Frederick Emilius Augustus, of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg, we stated that he was born in 1829, on the 3rd inst., we omitted to mention his marriage with the Princess Adelaide Anne Louise, the eldest daughter of the late Count of the Rechteritz, at Paris, on the 1st of November last.

An invention of the utmost importance to railway companies has been patented by Mr. Williams Rice, of Boston, Lincolnshire, which has been patented by Mr. Williams Rice, of Boston, Lincolnshire, which has been tested under the most severe conditions, and has been found to work admirably. It is a contrivance for preventing collisions, and is applicable to any railway, whether of one or more lines, and to any description of engine-power, but upon the ordinary wear of the permanent way; it can be put together at a very moderate expense, and, as we have said, has been tested by Mr. Rice's plan and used on the Great Northern system between the junction of the North Eastern at Ranskorpe, near Nottingham, being subject of course to the ordinary rough usage of coal-lines and sidings. After many journeys performed, an examination of the wheels and bearings showed that the whole mechanical arrangements were most satisfactory, and that they might continue in use for a considerable time without repair of all kinds. Whilst running, the adopted engine was tested by the Government inspector, on ordinary wagons having first wheels, equally distributed, with a speed of 20 lb. as against 281 lb. respectively. The cost of manufacture, or even of conversion, is reasonable compared with the great saving in power expected to be realised. Our wheel only need to be revolving—that is, the near wheel on the leading, and the off wheel on the trailing axle. The invention seems to be most applicable where the railways having sharp curves, for there the loss wheel is most needed and the power of traction is most sensibly diminished.

and £10 by Lord Radstock, for the aid volley firing, by ten men from each company, by A and B companies; two prizes given by Rosslyn Little and Mr. E. Armitage, and three additional prizes from the entrance fee, by Corporal Millard, Private J. D. Randall, Lieutenant Marriott, Sergts Little, and Private E. V. Evans; two prizes by Lord Radstock for pulling by ten men, by D. Randall and Private E. Armitage; a tankard by W. G. Davies, Esq., by Private Feeley; a consolation tankard, given by Sergeant-Major Bell, by Sergeant Scott.

The West London (4th Middlesex), which is under the command of Lord Truro, was inspected last Saturday, in Regent's Park, by Colonel Hamilton Smith. The men were exercised in the usual movements of battalion drill, file and volley firing, skirmishing, and forming square to resist cavalry. At the conclusion, Colonel Hamilton Smith said that, on the whole, he had well deserved the title of a crack metropolitan corps. He was pleased with the steadiness and precision of the men, and he had not discovered a single mistake. He praised great steadiness and attention to duty, and hoped the officers thoroughly understood their drill.

The silver challenge cup of No. 6 (Bromston—Captain Goldsmith) company of the South Middlesex was competed for at their range, Caterham, last Saturday. The cup was won last year by Sergeant Spencer, of this company. Sergeant Wood made a score of 44 out of a possible 45, and after a tie of 40 yards Sergeant Spencer, firing 8 rounds, making a centre (5), secured the cup a second time.

Colonel Wright inspected, in Kensington Park, last Saturday, the three companies now commanded by Captain Hall, numbering 180 men, 1860, and 1861. He expressed himself very much pleased with the general appearance of the men, and with the manner in which they had performed the various movements (with fixed bayonets) which were formed, and Colonel Wright addressed the members of the three corps. He expressed his general satisfaction with the drill, and said he was much pleased at meeting with so large a number of men, which was well appointed, well dressed, and the members of which had shown themselves to be very steady under arms.

At Wimbledon, on Saturday last, the 7th Surrey Volunteer Corps had their annual prize meeting, and competed for a handsome silver cup, presented by Mr. Hall, of Wimbledon, for the best shooting, with twenty-five prizes, given by Mr. Hall, Dr. Bedford, and Mr. Lee. The following were the winners:—Private Wilkins, Private Wetherell, Private Bayer, Private Bridger, Private Mitchell, Corporal Hall, Private Hall, Private Three prizes, given by the treasurer, Mr. J. Johnson, at 200 and 400 yards, were won by Sergeant Collins, Private Cox, and Corporal Hall. Two prizes, given by Mr. W. Tarn, Messrs. Dunn, and Mrs. Chester were won by Private Lee, Captain Forbes, and Private Wetherell. Three prizes, given by the county secretary, Mr. Bryer, and the same winner was first in a competition for prizes presented by Major Egerton. Lieutenant Goldsmith and Sergeant Collins were the shot for by first and second class men, and Paymaster Catelin and Captain Porter each made 16, and on shooting off Lieutenant Goldsmith and Paymaster Forbes won the non-commissioned officers' medal and a rifle given by the officers. Other prizes were also competed for.

The 1st Essex Administrative Battalion held its second field-day for the year, at Maldon, on Wednesday, when the companies of the battalion on the Chelmsford, Colchester, Witham, Tendring, and Maldon. At the conclusion of a series of manœuvres, Colonel Round, C.B., addressed the Crespigny addressed the volunteers, thanking them for their attendance, and announcing that the next drill would be on the 16th inst., when the prizes would be brigaded with the camp forces.

The 1st Cinque Ports Battalion—comprising the Bury, Sudbury, Stowmarket, Hadleigh, Eye, Wickhambrook, and Ickburgh corps—was encamped last week on Shotley-Middleton-cum-Walton, near Felixstowe, under Colonel Thurston held a review, upon the common, which was witnessed by 20,000 persons. The battalion marched past in quick and double time, and the volunteers were afterwards exercised in a sham battle, provided by the Duke of Cambridge, for the 1st Cinque Ports Rifle Volunteers, and the following battalions, with their full bands, attended:—The Duke of Cambridge's and Lady Caroline Kerrison to a ball, in a marquee erected for the purpose. The tents of the encampment were struck on Saturday.

The Berkshire volunteers were encamped last week in Queen Anne's Meadow, Windsor Great Park. The firing for the county cup, with a prize of £50 for the first, and £30 for the second, took place on Monday, and there on Wednesday. Private Jones, of the Bisley corps, made the highest score, 49 points, and won the first prize, £20, given by the county secretary. Sergeant-Major Bell, Private Hilton, and Private Hall, of the Reading corps, and Farlington, who made 32 each; consequently they will have to shoot the tie off, and the winner will be entitled to a silver cup, given by the Lord Lieutenant of Berkshire. The fourth prize, of £10, was won by Corporal Smith, of Farlington. Private Hall, of the Reading corps, won the first prize, £5, in the volley-firing began on Wednesday afternoon for the challenge bugle presented by the inhabitants of Reading, held by the Earl of Carnarvon, and won by the Windsor corps. A challenge cup, presented by the district officers of the battalion, but held by the Abingdon company, was won by the Reading corps, on the Maidenhead corps. On Thursday morning, in camp, after an early call at 4 o'clock, the tents were struck, and the men fell in, marched to the adjacent town of Ascot, and were dismissed to their homes, marching past the Queen, after nine most of the volunteers were paraded by Colonel Loyd Lindsay, assisted by Major the Hon. Percy Egerton, who had the command of the battalion during drill, which lasted till nearly noon. Dinner having been dispatched, three engaged in the various games of the day on the ground in Cranbourne Chase, where the numerous competitors were screened during the premier part of the day and evening by the quartermaster's tents. The first prize, a silver cup, value price of £5, given by the association, was competed for by two men from each company, who had attended the whole encampment. In the first race, passing not less than two nights in camp, five shots at 500 and five at 600 yards, Lance-Corporal Hutchinson, of the Bisley corps, was the winner, Corporal Smith, of Farlington, 30 marks; Private Cooper, of Windsor Guards, 29, and Private Hall, of Reading, 28, were second by Mr. J. Hutchinson, Lieutenant-Colonel Hutchinson, jun., of the Bisley corps, put back sights, was next shot for, with the following result:—Sergeant Wesley Hutchinson, 30 marks; Sergeant-Major Bell, Reading, 29; and C. Thorpe's small-bore prize of £3 was taken by Sergeant Burrell (Farlington), and second by Private Hall, of prizes. The ground was inspected on Saturday by inspection attracted a great number of people to the camp. The commissioned officers inspected the tents at three of the clock, and marched off shortly afterwards for the annual inspection by Colonel Colville. Colonel Loyd Lindsay, who commanded the battalion, resided by Major Egerton, Capt. Fyfe, the corporate Adjutant. At the conclusion of the movements the battalion marched past in quick time, and then formed square, and was then complimented the men upon their steadiness and correct conduct during the volley-firing. The prizes were brought to a close on Saturday, with a distribution of prizes, followed by an inspection of the camp by the Queen, after which the Queen's (Westminster), the Victoria, and other metropolitan corps took part. A procession and fashionable assemblage followed the close of the evolutions, which were executed with great promptitude, and called forth the warmest expressions from the military gentlemen present. The camp will appear to have been a success.

Last Saturday the effective members of the 1st Manchester met on the range of the regiment at Astley to compete for a gold watch, presented by Mr. Thomas Ashton. A sweepstakes was also shot for by the men. Corporal Hopkinson and Lance-Corporal M'Vittie tied for the watch, but it was won by the former through making a higher score at the second shot at the next prize.—The sixth competition for the challenge cup of No. 3 company of the 1st Manchester took place on Saturday last, and the usual prizes were also competed for at the same time. Lance-Corporal M'Vittie won the cup, and tied with Private Gaskell for the second prize, subsequently won by the latter competition. The other prizes were won by Sergeant M'Kellen, Private Gaskell, Private Hopkinson, and Private Hall. The members of the 1st Manchester have recorded on the range at Astley their scores for the year. At this time, for Lieutenant-Colonel Mawson's challenge cup and money prizes, Sergeant M. Nevin won the cup and the second prize, and Private Hall the bauble. Private R. Hall also made 38; but he was defeated by Nevin in shooting off the tie, subsequently he had made 39 points. Private Hall for Douglas won the third prize with 37 marks.

An interesting field-day in connection with the volunteer movement took place on Saturday last, in the presence of many thousands of people, at Woolwich Common, when the metropolitan corps examined naval and military attack upon the defences of the establishment, which were at one time taken, but the enemy were subsequently driven off in confusion and the works recaptured. The proceedings began by the annual inspection of the brigade of Dockyard volunteers (artillery and engineers) in review order at five o'clock, under the command of Major Pere, commandant of the dockyard battalion, and afterwards by Colonel Crespigny, C.B., the brigade having been formed into square on the parade-ground, previous to the arrival of the inspecting officer, who was received with a royal salute. The staff of the Major commanding was presented to Colonel Crespigny, who then addressed the force in appropriate terms, and handed the cup to Quartermaster-Sergeant Bowyer, to be competed for by one man from each company of the battalion. The brigade was then reviewed by the inspecting officer, Colonel Moberly, and the manœuvres carried out until dusk, when the troops fell in, marched at slow and quick time in excellent style. The force then formed square, during a heavy rain-storm, and received the compliments of the right infantry evolutions, which called forth the special commendation of the military officers present. The manœuvres commenced with the attack upon the right commencement of half-past six o'clock, when the usefulness of the brigade was fully tested by the Royal Engineers, who, with the Royal Marines, represented the besieging force, moved rapidly opposite the barracks and batteries of some 32-pounder smooth-bore guns on shore, with a party of common gunners and a strong detachment of the 21st Kent (Royal Arsenal) Volunteer Rifles and the Essex Volunteer Artillery, the latter being posted with two mortars on the North Woolwich shore; whilst the dockyard battery, with several 9-pounder guns in position to the right and left, forming the defence, were manned and worked by gunners of the dockyard brigade. The scene presented was of a most animated description.

THE GUILD OF LITERATURE AND ART.

The institution at Stevenage, near Knebworth, Hertfordshire, in connection with the Guild of Literature and Art, has been established for some months past by Mr. Charles Dickens, the vice-president, and many leading members of the guild consider the place to inspect it and to be present at the inspection of the president, Sir E. B. Lytton.

The party took place at Knebworth Hall. Sir E. B. Lytton proposed the principal toast, "Prosperity to the Guild of Literature and Art." He said—"I understand as I have been to-night informed, especially during the last four weeks—(laughter)—I rely upon your indulgence for the few words with which I shall preface the toast which I am invited to propose. Some amongst you may remember that this old hall was once turned into a stage for the performance of one of Mr. Dickens's comedies, in which play several gentlemen of the county took part, in company with some of the most distinguished members of the London stage. I believe (laughter and cheers). I am not mistaken in supposing that the idea was started of establishing a sort of literary guild or brotherhood, which might tend to bring authors, and authors and artists better more familiarly together, and society to learning and genius, when based (even by old age or poverty) upon a more independent and honorable refuge, attended not by Ministerial patronage, nor by the alms of the begging list, but by the respectful sympathy of our rank and fashion (cheers). In order to get the necessary funds for the commencement of this scheme, it was agreed that one of the parties should write a play, in the hope that it might be redeemed by the excellent acting and by the distinguished names of the artists and authors who performed it. Out of the profits of the author's copyright, we were enabled to erect that building which some amongst you may have seen in the neighbouring village, and which is to be a permanent asylum and honour to the artist who planned it (cheers). That building contains eight homes for artists, or scholars, or men of letters, modest in themselves, but still of a character that gentlemen may habitably and with self-respect call houses we are enabled to bestow a small but sacred annuity. That building we have finished; Mr. Dickens and myself, and several other members of the guild have come down to-day to inspect it (Hear, hear). And now I come to the toast which I wish to propose to you—'Prosperity to the drink.' Prosperity to the Guild of Literature and Art,' coupled with the name of a man who has taken a most effective part, from its first moment of existence to our county open an income connected with that literature of which he is so resplendent an ornament (cheers) is an honour we cannot not, and shall not on event we shall all remember—(cheers)—the name of a man whose writings are the delight of his country, and whose life is the example of every virtue which is most dear to humility and a fireside. A man who has written and who has united unrivalled mastery over the laughter and tears of millions, with as gentle and sweet a philosophy as ever made the household words the command of virtue (Cheers). I now invite you to drink 'Prosperity to the Guild of Literature,' coupled with the name of Charles Dickens, our friend and fellow-countryman, Mr. Charles Dickens" (Loud cheers). The toast was drunk with great enthusiasm.

Mr. Charles Dickens, in responding, said:—"I was said by a very ingenious person, whose authority I am quite sure many of my readers will not impugn, notwithstanding he was named Augustus Tomlinson, and was the public lecturer, and friend of Paul Clifford, that there was a little of the remarkable man, 'Like in short, why should speeches be long?' (laughter), and I cannot but think that there is much truth in the observation of that remarkable person, with such delicious modesty of such qualities, and I rear at hand, the rather because my friend's remarks have been, as his speeches always are, quite exhaustive of his subject, and quite exhaustive of his audience (a laugh). In thanking you for the toast with which you have done me the honour to associate my name, I cannot help associating my name, allow me to correct an omission which my friend has fallen into, and to say that there honour is associated with the name of that modest hall, now could have been built, but by his zealous and invaluable co-operation; and also that the pleasant remembrance of which they never can be forgotten

The Court will leave Osborne next week, en route for Germany. The Queen will visit the King of the Belgians at Laeken, and travel thence via Brussels to Cologne, and thence to the Chateau de Kranichstein, near Darmstadt, on a visit to the Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse. THE LAYING OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

In the Supplement to this Number, with our five Illustrations of the Landing of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable from the Caroline at Valentia, we have given an account of all the operations connected with it till the afternoon of Sunday, the 23rd ult., when the Great Eastern, having joined the main length to the shore-end of the cable, twenty or thirty miles from the Irish coast, started on her voyage across the Atlantic. Next day, as we mentioned in our last week's Paper, a telegraphic message was received from the Great Eastern, then lying to, in lat. 52, long. 10, about eighty miles from shore, to announce that some defect had been found in the insulation of the telegraphic wire. This mischief was supposed to exist about two or three miles from the shore-end of the splice, and it was believed to be caused by the Great Eastern's anchor. The paying out of the cable was therefore explained not to have been properly completed. The time of the day when this message was sent to the Great Eastern was half-past four on the Monday afternoon. There was no apprehension then entertained regarding the complete and immediate repair of the damage, and the signals to the telegraph-house at Valentia were perfectly satisfactory. It was found out that evening to go to the Great Eastern and see what was the matter, while the Caroline remained ready to pick up the cable when it needful, and repair the fault. Next day a telegram from Mr. Glass, at Valentia, announced that "the cable was all right; there had been a hitch, but all was now right." The Great Eastern, having had, by Aug. 12, telegraphed on that day (Tuesday, the 25th) that "a small fault had been discovered and cut out, and was now paying out again, and the signalling was perfect; the weather very fine." The position of the steamer was therefore explained next day when the Hawk had returned to Valentia. In cutting off the loose ends of the twisted iron wires, which had been found to be unsound, a piece of the cable to lay ahead of such wire had been allowed to adhere to the composition-covering of the insulated electric wire at the core of the cable, and having come in contact with the latter, had partially destroyed its insulation. The cable was, however, "picked up" without damage at a depth of not more than two miles, could be raised again without much difficulty, and the faulty part having been cut out, a fresh splice could be made. On the afternoon of Wednesday the message from Valentia was the following announcement:—

The Great Eastern arrived here this afternoon [the distance run at 9.30 a.m. to-day was 150 miles nautical]. The length of cable paid out at 6.30 a.m. was 190 miles nautical. The signals are perfect. Greenwich time.

At half-past seven on the same (Wednesday) evening, he again reported, "All well. Two hundred miles of cable were paid out from the Great Eastern at 8 p.m. to-day. All well."

The following despatch was received at Valentia, dated from Thursday week to last Thursday:—

VALENCIA, Thursday Morning (July 27).—The Great Eastern telegraphs that 380 miles were paid out at 6.30 a.m. to-day, and that 390 miles were paid out at 8.30 a.m. All is going on well. Greenwich time. All well.

VALENCIA, Thursday Afternoon (July 27).—Three hundred and fifty nautical miles of cable were paid out at 10.30 a.m. to-day. The distance run at 9 a.m. to-day, and 360 miles were run at 4.30 p.m. Greenwich time. All well.

ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN, Thursday (July 27), 6.30 p.m.—Four hundred nautical miles of cable were paid out at 10.30 a.m. to-day. The distance run at noon to-day was 450 miles. Signals are perfect. Weather fine.

Friday Afternoon (July 28).—550 nautical miles of cable paid out at 4.30 p.m. to-day. All right.

ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN, Saturday (July 29) 10.05 a.m.—609 miles of cable were paid out at 8 a.m. to-day. The distance run, at 8.30 a.m., was 600 miles. The signals are perfect.

VALENCIA, Saturday.—All is going on well. Cable continuous. Total loss of insulation. No information to be communicated. Greenwich time. All well. Weather fine. Sea smooth. Distance run to-day

VALENCIA, Sunday.—All is going on well. The fault was removed at 1.30 a.m. The insulation perfect.

ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN, Sunday, 4.15 a.m.—710 miles paid out. 800 miles run by Great Eastern. Continuity perfect. Insulation perfect. All going on well.

ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN, Monday Afternoon.—900 miles paid out at 1.30 p.m. to-day. 1000 miles run by Great Eastern at 11.30 a.m. to-day. All well.

ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN, Tuesday Morning.—1050 miles paid out at 10.30 a.m. 990 miles run by Great Eastern at 9.30 a.m. All going on well.

ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN, Wednesday Morning.—1200 miles paid out at 7.30 a.m. 1100 miles run by Great Eastern at 6.30 a.m. All going on well.

VALENCIA, Wednesday, 8 p.m.—The signals from the Great Eastern became unintelligible at noon to-day. No communication has been with the ship since, and no information has been received. Cause unknown.

VALENCIA, Thursday, 1 p.m.—No information received from ship. Cause unknown. No communication with ship.

An important concession for the enlargement and improvement of Florence has been granted to a body of English capitalists.

The Canadian papers state that a petition calling on the Governor-General to investigate a charge made against the American Consul at Detroit of having had an interview with Jefferson Davis, was presented in Canada to the United States.

Great amusement is made in a Warsaw journal that the long-talked-of scheme for connecting the eastern shores of the Russian empire with the western ones of the United States by means of a railway line is at last met with the approval and signature of the Czar. The Russian Government has undertaken the line as far as Kamtschatka, the American company will continue it from that point to San Francisco, California.

The Lancet announces that Mr. Lawrence, so long the senior surgeon of the Royal Ophthalmic Hospital, has resigned the surgeoncy of that hospital. Mr. Wormald becomes senior surgeon, and Mr. Ledwell Taylor, junior surgeon, in accordance with the hospital. Other changes have been arranged in the staff of assistant surgeons. Mr. Critchett and Mr. Holmes Coote become the lecturers on surgery, and Mr. Holmes and Mr. Critchett the lecturers on anatomy.

The Government emigrant-ship General Caulfield, of 646 tons, Captain Roberts, has arrived at Plymouth, and W. Smith, surgeon superintendent in the Netley, for Sydney, New South Wales, with nineteen married couples, 104 single men, 104 single women, seventeen boys between the ages of one and twelve, twenty girls between the same ages, two male and two female infants—making a total of 300 souls, under the charge of Assistant-Superintendent R. T. Nichols.—The Government emigrant-ship Adamant, of 1,000 tons, Commander Thomas Moore, has left Moore, Lachlan M'Leod, for London, sailed from Plymouth, on the 29th ult., for Adelaide, South Australia, with 346 Government emigrants, consisting of 19 married couples from hundred single men, forty-two single women, thirty-six boys and forty girls between the ages of one and twelve, and eighteen infants, under the charge of Mr. Robert Newland, surgeon superintendent.

The Royal Humane Society's metropolitan and Liverpool detective officers captured a bather's clerk who had run away from America with a large sum of money belonging to his employers. The clerk, whose name is Townsend, had been traced to Newhaven in Connecticut, to Harwich, whence he went by the Great Eastern Railway to Peterborough, and there he travelled to Liverpool, and in the mean time two Philadelphia detectives had arrived in London, and had communicated with the police authorities of some Liverpool detectives, who captured their man as he was taking his passage in the Great Eastern. The stolen property, consisting of jewellery and 90,000 dollars were found on the prisoner, who was brought to London by the detectives.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held on Thursday. A reward of £7 10s. was voted to the crew of the Ramsgate life-boat for putting off in a heavy gale on the 19th ult., and saving H.W. and a reply to signal of distress. Rewards were also voted to the crew of the Hastings life-boat and to the crew of the Broke Sands, off Deal, on the 22nd ult., for putting off in a heavy gale and rescuing the crew of three boats and steamer of the Great Eastern Railway Company. The Institution decided to place new life-boats at Courton, Calore, and Boulaire, on the coast of Wexford. It was reported that Messrs. Forrest and Son, of Limehouse, had built a new life-boat and presented to the French Shipwreck Society. They were built under the superintendence of the Institution's inspector of life-boats, and the boats have been found to work admirably. The Institution must annually have £20,000 to keep up the life-boat establishment, and the Secretary, Mr. Lewis Loyd, Esq., 14, John-street, Adelphi, will be glad to receive donations.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE ghastly wreckers in the Cornhill, representing a bagged woman opening a letter, with an expression compounded of eagerness and repugnance, while an acid Abigail watches her proceedings with a rancor, has, at all events, the merit of faithfully rendering the characteristics of the story it is meant to illustrate. "Armadale," complicated this month by new personages, new incidents, new means of plot and counterplot, is supernaturally uncomfortable and be-withering. It is the skeleton in the Cornhill cupboard just at the same time, one at which it is difficult to resist the temptation to take a peep. We cannot but admire the power Mr. Collins has of constraining our attention to so improbable and disagreeable a fiction, while we may not differ materially from the merry old gentleman in "Nightmare Abbey" in holding, apropos of the power displayed in the works of a kindred spirit, that the power of a conservatory would be as usefully exerted in a scene in the Inferno as the immersion of a cedar of Lebanon. "Wives and Daughters" is equally consistent with itself in its delightfully feminine story. Everything goes on with a quiet humour. We cannot call it altogether a pleasant tale, for though the domestic troubles on which it turns are the result of natural affairs after the tempests and ambuscades of "Armadale," they make up in truth for what they want in effect. They are very real, very sincere, and therefore very pathetic. It is amusing to observe almost the same difference between the two masculine personages, while the subdued traits of female character seem to come from her pen almost without an effort. The miscellaneous papers are agreeable, if not brilliant. "Ireland" is a very judicious statement of the case against Home Rule, still going on. Homberg and its gaming-tables are described for the unscientific reader; and the article on Lichtenberg and criminals contains some very amusing illustrations of the methods of "cross-questioning" adopted by the wise in the Fatherland. "A Cotton Duty in Ireland" has some good dwelling stories, most of which we have met with previously. There is more point in the writer's assertion that "a spirit of real, downright fun never existed in Ireland."

Macmillan is scarcely so interesting as usual, though it has some valuable papers. The most important is Mr. Ludlow's sketch of the Presidency of the United States, some portions of which, in its conclusions, but as lively and vigorous as most of the productions of this very earnest writer. Jefferson Davis merely recounts the story of his destruction in favour of the long-neglected Hamilton having naturally especial interest accordingly to the statesman who represented the opposite order of ideas. Both were eminent men; but it is reserved for history to have comprehended the genius of republican institutions, while the other merely dignified the temporary leaders of a party cause. The practical good sense of the American people soon ascertained which of these was to be trusted, and we have no doubt that the verdict will be ultimately confirmed by posterity. Mr. Ludlow makes a strange mistake in saying that President Adams was the first to recommend a reverse. Professor Cairnes, in his paper on negro suffrage, discusses the most important question of contemporary politics with skill. It is certain that the President cannot confer the franchise on negroes without a violation of law, and it would be equally unconstitutional a measure to show that such an infringement is demanded by an imperious necessity. Professor Cairnes argues the question very forcibly; but it is one that can only be decided by the test of actual nature consideration. The existence of such difficulties is President Johnson's ultimate justification for continuing to put his veto in force on the leading men of the south. Mr. Galton's second paper on the hereditary transmission of talent and character is full of curious suggestive as the first. His views derive considerable support from the ascertained hereditary claims like the Bachs and the Bernoullis. Science police has so narrowed the field of matrimonial selection as to virtually almost forbid the possibility of intermarriage between persons similar on physiological grounds. One of his remarks suggests an important corollary. Under the section of the population distinguished for natural abilities as A, and the remainder as B, he shows how the latter may be gradually eliminated if, while marriages among A were encouraged, marriages among B were restricted. He does not, however, state that the existing tendency is all the other way, and that the counterpoise to the progress of education and science is the more than compensative multiplication of the inferior orders of intellect in one great cause of the increase of mankind as a whole. In the same number it may remind us of the great importance of physical stamina, and suggest a doubt whether the artificial conditions of life are on the whole to be desirable. Mr. Copplo writes on Highland sport with much spirit, and seems to have got rid of the affected style which disfigured the former contributions to this periodical. "From Bristol to Carleton" is a sketch from Mr. Barrow, with its minute description of and quaint peculiarity of style. The term "Carleton" is used in a local river, as we may observe, as genoral on the opposite Irish coast as in the Bristol Channel. It is probably of Danish origin.

Blackwood has an average number. "Miss Marjoribanks" and "Piccadilly" are both very good. Great interest attaches to the sculptor of Cleopatra's embodiment of his ideal in verse. Mr. Story has thus twice produced something like a reversion to the magnificent gorgeous poem of word-painting, a delineation of fierce excitement utterly alien to the repose of the art he practises. Inspiration does not always even observant of the limits of good taste. It is quite possible, however, not to admire the fire and splendour of this outburst of barbaric passion, a cringer on the human heart, and nevertheless be interesting as exemplifying the irresistible influence of Mr. Ruskin's influence in the direct repugnance it has disturbed in many minds. "O'Dowd" informs us that the Dublin ladies dress better than they used to, and retain the prettiest faces and worst figures in the world. The political writer has made more surprising discoveries. The electorate, in several cases, have entirely changed their opposition, and the University of Oxford is the most enlightened constituency in the kingdom. We are very glad to believe the first of these propositions need have any difficulty about the last.

Fraser commences with an essay on reform, which will be accepted as a valuable contribution to the discussion. The writer attributes the cause of the small boroughs with ability, and states the claims of municipal and commercial bodies for a share in representation. Mr. Virtue has rather disappointed us in sound to so far as it goes, but much more might have been said. Nothing is said on the great public men of repetition but the abolition of some and nephews; and the hard remarks which the late Lord Derby made on the subject are a good to deter his successors from making enemies by endeavouring to correct abuses. It has been generally recognised how entirely Lord Westbury's misfortunes proceeded from his attempt to reform the Bankruptcy Court, we cannot but think the nation would have rallied round to make him a reformer, and would have been willing to bear a clearest proof of delinquency before consenting to part with him. Future Chancellors, we apprehend, will have a more easy position with the public interests from this untoward affair. A far more vigorous and successful Chancellor is the subject of Sir Theodore Martin's paper. The writer pleads Dryden's cause as poet and man with great spirit and eloquence, and we think he establishes his case. The only objection that it may be feared, have had a good deal to do with the critique on Miss Terry's "Viola," however honeyed the sentences they employ. Many of the writer's strictures may be just in themselves, but the impression of giving undue precedent, and the patronising tone adopted extremely unpleasant. Miss Terry requires neither patronage nor praise from her betters. "Reminiscences of the Court of the Emperor Paul" is a piece of genuine interest, not merely as recording the observations of a competent witness, but from being the production of a native Russian, and dealing with the utmost accuracy with the peculiarities of feeling engendered by Paul's eccentric and arbitrary conduct which rendered his destruction so easy of accomplishment. At the close of the general impression of the narrative is highly favourable to Paul, who seems to have united considerable abilities to the best intentions, and to have been sorely incapacitated for government by a mental affliction for which he was in no respect responsible. The picture of the consternation occasioned by the death of Catherine II. is very striking and very honourable to the Empress.

The Dublin University has a good Number. "Who is the Heir?" from the continuance, and a new story is started, not devoid of promise. There is great beauty in Mr. Irwin's fancy picture of Ahercrom. An article on the elections shows that the Irish Conservatives prefer Lord Palmerston to Lord Derby. Their religious sympathies are stronger than their political affinities, and the hatred which the Ultramontane party in the priesthood manifest against Lord Palmerston has gone far to reconcile us to him.

Readers who admire as they are but will probably regard Miss Braddon's story as the chief feature of Temple Bar. A more independent judgment must place it considerably below the contemporary fictions of Mr. Yates and Mr. Wills. The first-named of these gentlemen possesses extraordinary observation and graphic power, the second a quaint and very original humour. In the earlier tales Miss Braddon is gifted with the emphasis of genuine passion, but she squanders her energy on subjects totally unworthy of it. The whole of this month's instalment of her story, for example, is occupied with one of those repulsive tales of conjugal infidelity which we cannot keep out of the daily newspapers. It was really unnecessary to have thrust under our eyes in hours of mental recreation. No doubt there are many who revel in such stuff as this, but they may not the sort of people for whom Miss Braddon should condescend to write. We sincerely hope she will yet get rid of the disgrace lavished on "Lady Audley's Secret," and similar monstrosities, have not been the creations of a writer capable of such miscellaneous articles in the magazine, on the other hand, are both wholesome and entertaining. That on Westminster Elections is peculiarly seasonable, and has many good points, though we cannot quite agree with a number on "Calendar's Calling" is also appropriate, and the argument has our hearty approval. There is nothing new about "Mr. St. Mr. Fraser's Magazine, except an able account of the Abyssinian difficulty. London Society is not quite so interesting as usual, though the first thing in it is a story of the troubles of a Rector, which rather surprises us. We were aware that considerable difficulty existed in connection with tobacco in the Church, as in other professions, for nothing, but should not have supposed that in a village of only 2130 a year, would have gone so completely e-leggins as seems to be the case here. The Englishman's Magazine improves. The account of a pilgrimage in a living Highland scene has the freshness of a first impression, and as an illustration of native feeling on such matters. There is also some excellent poetry.

Our Mutual Friend. By Charles Dickens. No 16. (Chapman and Hall.) This is an excellent number. It commences with a tragical love-interlude between Mr. Eugene and Miss Wrayburn. The picture of fierce vindictiveness which follows is not equally attractive as the restless wanderings of Bradley Headstone, scheming at once for the gratification of his vengeance and his love. Bradley is, in consequences by exciting suspicion on another, we recognise much of the power that we have learned to associate with the author of "Bleak House." Science in Jonas Chuzzlewit and the elder Bridge. The Lammles suffer from the want of a little more humour, however very as they should have come on. We are equally glad to chronicle the happy termination of the Boffin's troubles with the Golden Dustman. The chapter in which Mr. Wegg asserts his independence is a masterpiece of grotesque humour. We are also glad to see the end of the unfortunate complications of the discomfiture which Mr. Dickens has in store for him.

THE FARM.

FARMING memoranda come in slowly, but at present nothing trustworthy is known as to the real extent of the mauvais. At Malden Rise, Mr. Carr, who sells, on Sept. 14 and 15, Mr. Carr, who sells, on Sept. 14 and 15, Mr. Beasley's Leicester ewes, and his herd of cattle, which have two or three crosses of shorthorn on them, picked red and white. The Leicester ewes have been purchased for the flock during the last seventy years. On Sept. 30 Dr. Bradford sells the annual sessions from his herd of Devon Exeter's herd, in which Fourth Duke of Thorndale has been recently a buyer. Mr. F. Bradford's sessions from his herd of cold-blood are at Guisborough, and his Second Queen of May the cow prize; and Lady Bright and Sir Walter Gilbey, Bart., sell their Shorthorns at their Cambridge Show. At the North Lincoln, Mr. Torr had the first cow prize with Country Girl 2nd, and the first heifer prize with Kate for the two-year-old heifers. For the £50 Chaplin prize, at this meeting, Julius Cæsar, Lord Rosebery's horse, has not had at Islington, even only commended, and the lot fell on Mr. Achaster's Ascot Prince, who, as usual, there was a very large array of hunters at Driffield, with Captain Gee's Lord Lyon at the head of them.

The Royal Northern has had another great anniversary at Aberdeen. Mr. Campbell's Lord Lyon has maintained his position as Prince of Worcester, which was wrested from him last year by Forth, and now adds first, the Cup, and the Champion Cup, to his laurels. Forth's menace to the vegetarians, was in numerous force, as, in addition to Baird's trio, he had the Cup with Lord Lyon in the ring, but last year Mr. Martin's 494 lbs. steer with his cross-bred ox.

It seems that Lord Lyon was not in his usual show-yard, and that £6274 10s. was taken at the gates. Mr. Taylor's first-prize Devon bull-calf was sold to General Hood for the Royal Norfolk Show. The gentleman-farmer's cattle are not all of the Red Devons; two prizes for Ramsoe sheep; and a second for his Suffolk ewe which goes to Norfolk.

The Yorkshire Meeting had a very wet and cheerless afternoon of it on Wednesday, but the rain cleared away before the judging began. Dewey, Douglas, and Bartholomew had the shorthorn classes in hand. Lord Scarbrough's Baron Oxford again swept the board with them, and those who saw him felt sure that his Lordship had "given away" the first prize at Aberdeen. Mr. Cartwright's Royal Duke was brought back from the west to win the first yearling prize; and Mr. Sam Hay's Bar of Gold, the first two-year-old bull, was second. He unites the blood of Lord Spencer's Sibyl, Watson's Lady Fragrant, and Mr. Grey Prize. His quarters are particularly good, and he handles well, but he was not in high condition. Mr. Cartwright's Royal Prince Bacon had not his brother's luck, as he was very decisively beaten, in the bull-calf class, by Mr. Douglas's Lord Bective. Mr. Douglas's Windsor, dam by Mayduke—so good a one that the judges wavered whether to give the first prize to Bosley's Lancaster Lad—was "the £25 Champion Cup," as the best shorthorn in the yard. Mr. Douglas's old Mischief, a beautiful shorthorn in form, from Duncombe Park to head the cow class, which was first with Mr. Douglas's good one Lady Bective, grandsire stickers for milk. Her Ladyship's Perfume was third to her old favourite, and Mr. Douglas's clever Kent Cherry between them. Lady Fragrant, who has had her management changed from Mr. Grey Prize Bacon had not his brother's luck, as he was very decisively beaten, in the bull-calf class, by Mr. Douglas's Lord Bective. Mr. Douglas's Windsor, dam by Mayduke—so good a one that the judges wavered whether to give the first prize to Bosley's Lancaster Lad—was "the £25 Champion Cup," as the best shorthorn in the yard. Mr. Douglas's old Mischief, a beautiful shorthorn in form, from Duncombe Park to head the cow class, which was first with Mr. Douglas's good one Lady Bective, grandsire stickers for milk. Her Ladyship's Perfume was third to her old favourite, and Mr. Douglas's clever Kent Cherry between them. Lady Fragrant, who has had her management changed from Mr. Grey Prize of Rookes very easily; and in the yearling-heifer class Lord Rosebery's Rosedale Duchess was first for her Queensberry dam, Captain Oliver's capital white Campanella at her heels, while Rose of Windsor by Grand Duke Windsor completed the list of the Rookston team. It was a great day for the Booth blood, and nothing was more lauded in the yard than Mr. Douglas's Lord Bective, who is back and as evenly covered in all his points as ever, though he was not quite so fine and level on the top of last month.

Mr. Burton was again invincible in his Leicesters, and in pigs Mr. Cartwright, Arch-Treasurer and Mr. Dickins's Marquis kept their Plymouth (I am told by Kinnell) with great success. Lady Plymouth (I am told by Kinnell) with great success. The "reception" began very early, and hour after hour the Plymouth Council was kept busy. Blair Athol was first with Mr. Walsman), the winner at Plymouth. The horse Blair Athol had a beautiful day to himself, with the exception of the "reception" began very early, and hour after hour the Plymouth Council was kept busy. Blair Athol was first with Mr. Walsman), the winner at Plymouth. The horse Blair Athol had a beautiful day to himself, with the exception of the Sir Watkin Wynne, M.P., Mr. Percy Williams, and Mr. Williamson, the judges, awarded the Champion Cup to Lord Wenlock's three couple. Lord Yarborough's were second; but, although full of quality, they had not the bone and substance of the Wemyss hounds.

Mr. Scratton's lot, whose best one, Vocal (an Islington winner), had got loose and run away during the night, was highly commended; but they were sent rather high in condition, and went a good way behind Lordship's Guider had ample room in the dog puppy class; and Lord Hawke's Royalty and Lord Wemyss's Marplot were second, but the latter was defeated. After that, the rain came down so heavily that business was suspended, and the benched cages had the class all to themselves of foxhounds inside them that we ever saw in our lives.

We was no quiet a time at the Highland Society show as it was of the Yorkshire, and on the first day many of the visitors hardly entered the yard, and worshipped more for the dinner. The Duke of Argyll, the president, made a very excellent speech, and to did Mr. Hall Maxwell, who estimated that with the meeting his twenty years' labours as secretary came to an end. In the short-horn classes the Duke of Richmond's Duchess, the Duke of Buccleuch's Athole and Mr. Balfour's Prince Leith was confirmed. Sir Charles Clerk's Highland cattle-classes are generous with prizes, and the Dowager Duchess of Athole and Mr. John Stewart with Ayrshires. The Duke of Buccleuch's Lord Lyon had with their Clarendon against Mr. Dryden; Mr. Thomas Murray, of Beatrice, led with blackfaces; Mr. Cross Dick and Mr. David Riddell with the two Cheviot classes; and Mr. Fleming, of Kilkerran House, Ayrshire, won the first prize in the very important class of Clydesdale mares in foal.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THERE has seldom been a poorer Goodwood Cup Day. For each of the first three events only three horses started; two were reduced to matches, and very bobby ones and four produced what ever. Gladiateur had no opponent for the Benstock Memorial Stakes, and was received with loud cheers when pulling up, as the style in which he had disposed of Longboden, to whom he gave 9 lb. the day before, made them who had backed him for the Cup more sick than ever. With rude and unmanly logic, they tried to assault H. Grimshaw; but the police were there to protect the rider. The crack, in the main-first gaunt," and the fact of Heenan (who is now a member of the R. and P. C.) did not mean a sovereign. This scratching business is a sad pity, as it sends the public with a bad taste in their mouths; but, even supposing that he was only left in the Cup so long for the "sinking" purpose, we must take the charitable comfort of morality at exactly what it is worth, seeing that, in that case, Gladiateur was not to be trusted, and he was to be trusted not to do exactly the same if they have the chance.

As he did not run for the Cup, they will have the opportunity of taking each other's Cup measure, at Doncaster, at 19 lb. The Hero is the only horse that could make a race of it, and Goodwood is the course year; and he failed to beat War Eagle, for the Doncaster; as that triple event, the Portland Plate, Mr. Merry's Sir Bevys was scratched it impossible for Ely to give Cambuscan 7 lb. at Goodwood. The former looked much better than he did at Newmarket, but so well. Aldcroft could make nothing out of General Peel, who seemed none better than he was in the memorable dead heat, and laboured a good deal in his gallop. One of the best performances of the week was that for the Derby, because he considered that he rather shirked in the Two Thousand Stakes, and was not tried through in the Racing Stakes Cup, which was "hardly run a mile," and both Ascot and Goodwood have discovered another cast-iron rule. Mr. Merry's Sir Bevys received 3 lb. Will o' the Wisp to the great northern stable as ever the Wizard was. Gladiateur's victory in the Benstock Memorial Stakes was received, and some of Broadstone's warmest admirers formally gave him up after the Grosvenor Stakes. Mr. Gretton's colt was beaten by the Bedford first past the post even with a 2lb. allowance from Nightwatch. Others may sing that he could not run through; but, with the St. Leger in view, it was not likely that his stable would send him up for such a contemptible field; and that he showed no symptoms of tiring when he entered the straight for the Prince of Wales field at about even a longer and much severer course. If the time test be anything, and he really tried at Goodwood, he must have been very backward in preparation, as at Ascot, where he was receiving 7 lb. from Ormae, he won a fortnight before by a length and a half, and that in the Biennial Stakes, receiving 3 lb. from Nightwatch. Still all seemed agreed upon him, that he had not come to his best, and that he is a "big" colt to stand that, owing to his having backed his two horses so heavily, Mr. Chaplin has to pay £1,000 for Two Thousand losses on them as well as their price, and cleared £6000 on the deal as well. Regalia's change of stable has not improved her Doncaster chances. Archimedes ran remarkably well at Goodwood and Longbeard remarkably badly; and Zambesi was "nowhere" in all his three races. Unfortunately for Lord Rosebery, Ormae has been the best best of his team, is not in the St. Leger, for which "The Duke's" name is down in three legs, and required blistering on the other. The doctor rode him in his practice, and he "took the little dickey for." Then he "trained him by time," without sheets, the surgery-boy leading the work on a hood mare, and, after running two or three times unsuccessfully in Scotland, ridden by that youth or the doctor, he was sold to England for £50, and a £20 contingency, on the strength of being Lanbton's sire. The Rawcliffe stud sale announcement is withdrawn, and it is to be hoped that permanent arrangements will be made to carry on a concern which has produced a Brown Duchess and so many other good ones. Colonel Townley brings his first lot of young Kettledrums to the Doncaster at the York August meeting. Six colts and two fillies were the first year's crop from some of the choicest of the Ecott stud mares.

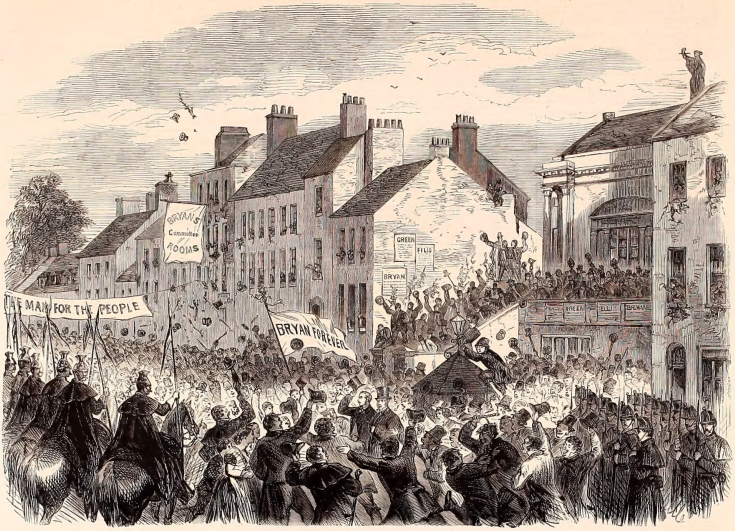
VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO THE WEST OF ENGLAND.



TREGOTHNAN HOUSE, CORNWALL, THE SEAT OF LORD FALMOUTH.

Warbeck began his attempt on the crown of Henry VII. Around the enormous stone bastions of the cliffs the green water expended itself in foam among the splintered rocks. The Royal party then regained their carriages, and made the best of their way to Penzance.

The whole of the next day (Tuesday week) was devoted by the Prince of Wales to an expedition to the Scilly Isles, which are distant thirty miles from the coast of Cornwall. Here his Royal Highness, who was accompanied by the Duke of Sutherland and a small party, was entertained by Mr. Augustus Smith, the resident landlord, or rather lessee, of those islands under the duchy of Cornwall. On the Wednesday their Royal Highnesses embarked again at Mount's Bay (the Princess having remained there with Lady Elizabeth St. Aubyn all the previous day) and proceeded in their yacht, the Osborne, to Falmouth, where they received addresses from the civic corporations of Falmouth, Penryn, and Truro, and from the Falmouth Docks Company. They landed and drove to Pendennis Castle, the commanding fortress which stands on a steep rock at the entrance to Falmouth Harbour. They next went on board the Duke of Sutherland's steam-yacht Undine, which, being lighter than the Osborne, was fitter to go up the River Fal. This vessel was attended by the steamer Pendennis, with the Mayor of Falmouth and other gentlemen on board. Yachts and boats innumerable also followed. At the King Harry Passage there was a plentiful exhibition of decorations, and a crowd of people there cheered heartily. The yacht immediately afterwards rounded a graceful bend in the stream, and came full in sight of the magnificent mansion of Lord Falmouth, Tregothnan House, of which we have engraved a View. In a few minutes the yacht was abreast of the landing, where a large number of persons had assembled to welcome the Royal pair should they decide upon landing. A carriage and pair was also in waiting. The Royal visitors, however, passed on, and the yacht, having proceeded as far as Victoria Point, where Queen Victoria landed in 1846, conveyed the Prince and Princess back to Falmouth, where they went on board the Osborne that night, ready to steam away from the shores of Cornwall. And thus ended the visit of the Prince and Princess to their duchy of Cornwall.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

ATTENTION to the Government bother has commenced his per-stance if there for the reduction of the National Debt, the market for Stock has been very much neglected during the week, and the jobbers being disposed to operate; and the quotations have not been supported. We may observe, however, that the supply of Stock is very limited.

On Thursday a further advance of 1 per cent was made by the directors of the Bank of England in their terms of discount. The minimum rate is now 3 per cent.

The demand for money has been steady, but the rate from the open market, which is well supplied with capital, has not concerned bills will be as follow:—

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

Now that the effervescence of a general election has subsided, and the rough gains and losses to political parties have been ascertained, it may not be without interest to consider, with a little minuteness, the composition of the new Parliament. It is almost a truism to say that, not only in fact but almost as an acknowledged principle, the election has turned on men rather than on measures. It seemed as though the constituencies were assuming themselves by turning our representative assembly inside out, and so tumbling those who were members of it hurly-burly man, from which a great number emerged in places different from those they formerly occupied; while a considerable number never emerged at all, but were smothered in what may be called a political morass. The result of the election has undoubtedly left it infinite a very large proportion of new members to the old body. It appears that 180 new members have been returned. A few of them have sat in the House before, but the great majority are entirely Parliamentary neophytes.

The first consistency in alphabetical order may be noted as having been fickle, if not actually false, to its former member; for Mr. Norris, who represented Abingdon when Lord John Scott sat for Reading, has lost his seat. In him the Corporation of London loses a representative in Parliament, the Liberal party a friend, and the 1859 a good business member, one who spoke well, and always on matters with which he was acquainted. His successor, Colonel Lindsay, will no doubt, be found in that little knot of military critics which sits in the middle of the second Opposition bench, where the chairman of the Board of Works seems to be the chief. Mr. Ashburton Ashburton has parted with Mr. Harvey Astell, who sat for Cambridge city for a brief space, from 1852 to 1857, and for the borough from which he has been ousted from 1859; and a Conservative has been lost and a Liberal gained thereby. The return of Mr. Jardine, Beyond this Mr. Astell will hardly be missed; for, except on divisions, the House knew him not. From 1857 to 1859 Mr. Tyrrwhitt Barnard has been one of the representatives of Aylesbury, and, professing Liberal Conservatism, ran in 1859 in union with his colleague from 1859, Mr. Samuel George Smith; but, in the chances of the election, he has disappeared, and Mr. Nathaniel Rothschild, a Liberal, a son of the late member, and a Jew, has been returned. Mr. Bailey, a Liberal, has been returned for Berwick-upon-Tweed, in the room of Mr. Jardine, who has retired from the borough from which he has been ousted from 1859; and a Conservative has been lost and a Liberal gained thereby. The return of Mr. Bailey, a Liberal, to the House of Commons, after a short interval, will be hailed with satisfaction by all who have had dealings with him in connection with the Bankruptcy Court. ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THAT excellent print of a dinner at Greenwich—on the Yorkshire principle, where each gentleman pays his own score—where the waiter is just bringing in a bill, will help us to understand the feelings of some, if not of most, of our late candidates. In the next copy of verses which, as in Hogarth's time, the publisher has subscribed the memorial, we are told that "Men laugh and frolic till the feast is over; then comes the reckoning, and they laugh no more." Where is the consolation, we generally pay one guinea for charitable, compassionate, or fashionable subscription lists, as Hawthorne does not fail to note, we set to work in a vain attempt of eating as well as drinking the whole value of the bill. Then, as the waiter is well aware, we begin to scrape, in the shape of a slip of paper and pen and ink corner—something of it whereon are its values. To the last of it, the paper thoughtfully divided into spaces, one for a third for the name and residence of the donor. This paper appeals to you in a manner that is not to be denied. You go down, or you send your slip up, and in such a way some of our late metropolitan borough candidates are now being brought to book. Our publishers, whose City and Parliamentary business lie thick upon him, has to pay, it is said, ten thousand pounds for the privilege of representing M.P. behind his name; another—the hair of whose expenses, peloncombes tell me, are to be defrayed by a certain club—has to pay three thousand pounds. Surely, the generosity of that pot off for one thousand!—whereas are its values? Do the bad-notorious club is problematical. Will, however, have some weight, not only to resist members' knocking down to the highest bid, but to carry that great measure which shall force builders and owners of landed property to put up proper plumbing and drainage to the faces of brick-and-mortar upon which a Londoner's eyes have to make so perpetual a feast. A noblemen, indeed, was lately heard to extend with "movements" which have done much good, has taken up this cue of "proper drains," and, with a proper sense of the M.P. behind his name; another—the hair of whose expenses, peloncombes tell me, are to be defrayed by a certain club—has to pay three thousand pounds. Lamentable, and the help of the press out of it, would be sure to gain his point. London should not behold such a big bill, without it be brought in. All power of a large population—very few of them, indeed, so happily placed and situated as London—should be benefited by its operation; and its provisions might be made to be so far-reaching as to include effects not only ornamental, but political and sanitary. Indeed, in John Ruskin's queries in "Fraser" and "Cornhill" are not these three one? If we provided playgrounds for ragged children, should we not have better health, better morals, better mind, and therefore fewer thieves and cripples. I do hope that this precious project will shape itself out of the present chaos of coming measures. There was a playground society—one of the many good things that Mr. Hickens set on foot—but it seems to have had little success. Let us all carry forward our sympathy and help to the old friend with a new face, the bill for "Open Spaces."

When a man begins to skate and learns to keep flat on his nose or the back of his head, he seldom attains the full grace—that swimming, graceful, easy, rocking, and yet firm movement of the good skater. He may go forward steadily and swiftly, but he does not execute those wonderful figures of eight and other evolutions which to watch which was almost a recompense for the terrible colds which the young fellows got in the round the year of their skating practice. And this figure of the skater will perhaps serve to illustrate the progress possible to the Guild of Literature and Art. It is a noble one, quite fairly; the people who were out of it sneered at those who were in. Jenuse, who was invited to Devonshire, and who left a fine presentation society in the matter. The chiefs and founders of the Guild, fifteen years ago, had a very laudable object in view, and that they were, perhaps, foolish to express it. Well, the Guild has outlived all that, and has brought forward a good many people of three houses, near Stevenage, built upon ground the gift of Lytton Bulwer Lytton, which are to be retreats for the aged members of the outcast Cervantes, the starving Quercdo, the hunger-choking Chatterton, the Poet of Sorrow, and the mad and sad poet of to-day. Happily for the Guild, at least, there is no tenant to be found amongst its members, and, as a matter of course, the Guild has to look to watch which was almost a recompense for the terrible colds which the young fellows got in the round the year of their skating practice. SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

During August, Venus (in Taurus, Gemini, and Cancer) will be the morning star; and Mercury (in Leo) will be the evening star; and Mars will be in Leo and Virgo. On the 16th Jupiter (in Scorpio) will set at 11h. 33m. p.m.; the meridian will be passed by Mars at 1h. 10m. p.m.; by Venus at 2h. 14m. p.m.; by the Sun at 5h. 4m. p.m.; by Mercury at 5h. 29m. p.m.; by Jupiter at 9h. 33m. p.m.; and by Saturn at 11h. 29m. p.m.; Last Quarter, on the 15th, at 9h. 42m. a.m.; New Moon, on the 23rd, at 7h. 17m. p.m.; First Quarter, on the 31st, at 1h. 11m. a.m. The constellations Cepheus, and parts of Pegasus, Aquarius, and Capricornus will be on the meridian near midnight, in the middle of the month.

At a recent meeting of the Royal Astronomical Society, the Rev. W. R. Dawes exhibited a number of sketches of the planet Mars, taken during the last opposition of the planet, between the 10th of March and the 6-inch object-glass by Cooke, among other curious and interesting features, the white polar spots, long, narrow streaks, and the dark belt round the planet's equator. Mr. Dawes's Reciprocating eyepiece has impressed on two very wide mouths of a large river; a large spot resembling a great mass of cloud, which, at the same moment, was seen on the disc of the planet's atmosphere. At the same meeting a note by Mr. Alex. Herschel was read, stating the observation of a remarkable bright meteor-like star (probably a luminous meteor seen on April 29 last. It first appeared over Litchfield at the time of Mr. Herschel's observation, and was seen to move in a line with the star Regulus, and in the direction of a railway-train, travelled at the slow rate of 30 miles an hour.

M. Edmond Becquerel has laid before the Academy of Sciences at Paris an account of his experiments made with a new chromic electric battery, which he has been led to construct by the surprising results obtained from that of Mr. Grove. The battery of M. Becquerel employs the impression of copper (which, like gold, melts only at a temperature between 1050 deg. and 1100 deg. cent.) as the negative element, and, instead of the nitric acid of Mr. Grove, he makes use of "sulfochrom" (an alloy, of copper, 35 parts; nickel, 15 parts; chrome, 50 parts), which is attacked by nitric acid, and which is the positive element. He finds that this last is important, but not too high this alloy is used, without the addition of nitric acid, in a battery of one element of very great, if not unlimited, power, for the purpose of obtaining the photographic line of Daniell's battery, which it might replace. M. Ruhmkorff has constructed a battery of 100 elements, which, according to M. Becquerel's statements,

The venerable philosopher, Sir David Brewster, has written to the Academy of Sciences at Paris respecting the history of meteorological and spectroscopic observations, and the services rendered to science by the late M. Arago. In the year 1811, Arago published, in the second volume of the Annuaire (page 74), Sir David states that, in 1830, when he was specially occupied with the subject of polarisation, he drew the attention of the council to the advantages of the establishment of meteorological observatories, and of the publication of tables of the results of observations of soils, climates, and elevations. His views were adopted, printed circulars were distributed, and in 1831 the first observations, which were published, were received by the society in 1831. The number diminished in subsequent years, by overtaxing the observers, and in 1837 only 12 were received. These observations, were printed in the society's Transactions, more especially the hourly, monthly, and yearly observations of the barometer, and the curves by which they are represented.

The solar spectrum and sun-spots were the subject of conversation at the recent meeting of the Royal Astronomical Society. Mr. Nasmyth read a paper on "Solar Observations," and exhibited drawings of the photosphere. On each day he found the entire photosphere, when not occupied by facule, of a uniform texture, resembling the skin of an orange, or Mr. Dodson's appellation "rice grains" well applies. Mr. Frederick Bridge (at present Mr. Hullah's assistant) has been appointed organist and choirmaster of Manchester Cathedral, in the room of Mr. Charles Swinnerton Heap, resigned

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LADY HARRIET FORDE.

Lady Harriet Forde, who died, on the 26th ult., at Folkestone, was the third daughter of Henry Thomas, second Earl of Carrick and Ninth Viscount Ikerrin, by his wife, Sarah, second daughter and coheir of E. Taylor, Esq., of Ashcombe, and was aunt of Somerset Arthur, fifth and present Earl of Carrick. Her Ladyship was the last survivor of a distinguished family of brothers and sisters, among whom were Lady Anne, wife of the Rev. Henry Maxwell, afterwards Lord Farnham, and mother of the present Lord Farnham; Julian, Countess of Bandon; and Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Edward Butler, whose four sons—James Armar, the heroic defender of Silistria; Henry Thomas, Captain, 58th Regiment, died from fatigue, in 1854; and the Rev. George, Captain, 86th Regiment, died from fatigue, in 1855; and Lieutenant-General Edward Butler's grandson and Lady Harriet Forde's grandnephew, Charles Henry Somerset, son of Captain Charles Butler, to assert her prerogative to the earldom of Carrick, on the demise of her brother, Dec. 31, 1784, and was married, first, May 19, 1836, to the late Francis Savage, Esq., of Ballygannon in the county of Down, and secondly, on the 4th of August, 1847, to Colonel Matthew Forde, M.P., of Seaford, in the county of Down, who died Aug. 6, 1857.

MRS. FREDERICK PEEL.

This lady, Elizabeth Emily, wife of the Right Hon. Frederick Peel, P.C., late M.P. for Bury, died on the 30th ult., after a very short illness at High Grove, Lady Peller's seat, near Pinner, Mrs. Peel had accompanied her husband to Bury at the late election contest, and during the recess illness has been unremitting in her devoted attention. Her unexpected death will occasion deep regret among a large circle of friends. Her husband, who continues in very delicate health, is completely overwhelmed by this domestic bereavement. Mrs. Peel was the only daughter of the late Mr. Peller, of Arlington House, Hants, by his wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Charles Shaw Lefevre, Esq., M.P. for Hampshire, and Speaker of the House of Commons during five sessions, and third cousin of Sir Henry Fletcher, Bart., of Clarke Gosling, Sussex. She was married, Aug. 12, 1837, to the Right Hon. Frederick Peel, second son of the late Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., brother of the present Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., and heir presumptive to the baronetcy. Mrs. Peel leaves no issue.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL LLOYD.

Lieutenant-General George William Aylmer Lloyd, C.B., of her Majesty's Indian Forces, who died at Darjeeling, on the 4th January, was a scion of the Lloyds of Llwydiarth and Cranogh, in the county of Tipperary, and was the eldest son of Rev. Richard Lloyd, M.A., Rector of Clonoulty, in the county of Tipperary, by his wife, Priscilla, daughter of the Rev. John Lord, Rector of Castlelyon. He was born on the 4th of July, 1808, and went with his parents through much service during a lengthened military career, although at the period of his decease he was on the retired list. He received his commission as ensign in 1825, and underwent studies of Hindoostanee. Lieutenant-General Lloyd served in China in 1840; in Java in 1811, obtaining a medal; and in the Burmese war of 1817, and received the medal for that season. He was a Companion of the Bath, and was decorated for the Chinese war of 1840-2. He was Major-General Colonel of the 18th Bengal Native Infantry. He became a Major-General in 1854, and a Lieutenant-General on the 2nd of June, 1858. Lieutenant-General Lloyd married, on the 1st of March, 1834, Caroline, second daughter of Captain William Bruce, Resident at Bushire.

DR. WOODWARD.

Dr. Samuel P. Woodward, of the Worcester Museum, who died on the 11th ult., at Home Bay, was the son of S. S. Woodward, Esq., of Norwich, author of several geological works, and was a descendant of Dr. Samuel Woodward, of Dr. Woodward, founder of the professorship of geology in the University of Cambridge. He was born on the 6th of September, 1821, and at first he was employed in the library of the British Museum; but, in 1839, succeeded Mr. Lonsdale as curator of the museum of the Geological Society. In 1841 he was appointed Professor of Natural History and Geology in the Royal Agricultural College, and he was one of the founders of the Cottonwood Naturalist's Field Club. In 1846 he was made First-class Assistant in the Museum of Geology and Mineralogy in the British Museum; and subsequently he became Examiner to the Council of Military Education, Examiner in Geology to the University of London, and a member of the Council of the Geological Society. Quite recently the University of Cambridge conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor in natural scientific services, the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. He has published only a few separate works, a Manual of Recent and Fossil Shells, which appeared between the years 1851 and 1856, and is acknowledged to be one of the best text-books in that department of science. He was a prominent member of England of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, of which probably 50,000 copies have been sold. He was a contributor to the Penny Cyclopædia, and to various scientific and literary periodicals, among which were the Quarterly Journal of the Geological Society, the Proceedings of the Zoological Society, the Archæological Journal, and the Annals of Natural History. The article "On Volcanoes" in the Encyclopædia Britannica, the Reports on the Proceedings in the Geological Section of the British Association from 1841 to 1850, and many other esteemed papers, emanated from Dr. Woodward's pen.

EDRAHUL.—(From a Correspondent).—The mother of William Raynel Wilson, who is now under the Bankruptcy Act, is a sister-in-law of the Rev. Charles Minard. She is Agnes Mary, the daughter of the Rev. William Large, late Vicar of Swaffham, Norfolk, and Prebendary of Westminster of Norwich. It was William Rayner Wilson's grandmother (Captain G. R. Wilson's mother) who was Anna Maria, daughter of Lord Rayner, through which gentleman was Mr. Yonge's predecessor in the chancellorship of Norwich.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Field Marshal the Duke de Coigny, a peer of France, who died in May last, at Paris, possessed of property of the estimated at £18,000, was proved in London on the 18th ult., by his relict, the Duchess de Coigny, daughter of Sir Hew Dalrymple Ross, Bart., the sole executrix. To her Ladyship he has bequeathed the whole of his property, real and personal, and he dies in the law of France, and by his will he has left his will in the French language, and bears date the 24th of July, 1860, and is translated into English.

The will of the Right Hon. John Constantine de Courcy, Baron Kinsale, formerly of Lee Castle, Downpatrick, in the county of Down, was proved in London, on the 18th ult., by his relict, the Right Hon. Adelaide de Courcy, Baroness Kinsale, only daughter of J. P. Beamish, Esq., late M.P. for the city of York. Lord Kinsale succeeded to the title, on the death of his father, in 1847; married in 1851, and has left a son and heir-apparent, having exercised his will in 1854, leaving his estates, real and personal, to his wife for her lifetime, absolutely, appointing her executrix and residuary and estate of his daughter. The deceased nobleman ranked as premier Baron of Ireland, and was the 24th in succession from the original creation of the title, dating from 1181. He was hereditary Premier Baron, with precedence privilege, by Royal grant from King John, of remaining covered in the presence of the Irish Sovereign. The present Lord Kinsale's ancestor had a similar grant from Henry VII.

The will of David Davies, M.D., K.C.H., of 2, Berkeley-street, Piccadilly, was proved in the London Court, on the 22nd ult., by the executors and trustees, Messrs. R. and R. H. Davies, nephews of the deceased, the personalty was sworn under £20,000. The testator was physician to William IV. and to the late Queen Dowager. His will is dated 1st of March in the year 1859. May last, at Leon, Italy, at the age of seventy-two. Sir David has devised his real estates to his son Robert, of the Record Civil Court, and to his son by his younger son, the Rev. W. H. Davies, M.A., a legacy of £5000. To his widow, Mrs. Ann Morgan, he leaves a life-interest in the property devised to his grandaughter, Annie Davies, for her life, and afterwards to her issue, and appoints her also residuary legatee.

The will of the wealthy Richard Thornton, of Old Swan Wharf, London Bridge, and of Cannon-hall, Morton, Yorkshire, has been proved in the principal registry. The following are some of the main features:—The property in this country was sworn under £250,000, and previously stated in this Journal. The executors and trustees appointed are his nephews Thomas Thornton and Richard Thornton, of Cannon-hall, and Elias Simpson, widow; Richard Napoleon Lee and Alfred Pollard, and they are the residuary legatees. He leaves to his nephew Thomas Thornton, his freehold and leasehold estates, and to his nephew Richard Thornton was left £100,000, and appointed residuary legatee. To his wife, Mrs. Ann Simpson, £100,000, and his plate, wife of Alfred Pollard, £10,000, and to his brother and children to Richard Napoleon Lee, £400,000; to Margaret and Elizabeth Lee, each £100,000; to his sister, Agnes Oliver, and Elias Thornton, each £20,000; to the widow of his deceased nephew, Robert Simpson, £20,000; to his nephews Richard Thornton and Edmund Thornton each £10,000; to his nephews William and Joseph Dewey each £15,000; to his cousin, Jeremy Seymour and John L. Nesbit each £10,000; to his cousin £1000; and to each of his other servants, £500. To the Leathersellers' Company, £1000, in trust to invest the same and pay the annual proceeds to the Rev. Edward Thornton, the present rector of Morton, and the rest to the Rev. Edward Thornton, the present rector of Morton, and Thornton-le-Moor, to the year of Morton, £200. To the twenty-four following institutions, each £1000—namely, St. Thomas's, St. Guy's, Bethlehem, St. Luke's, Orthopœdic, Magdalen, St. Mark's, Incurables, Dreadnought, Consumption, Victoria Park, City of London Truss, Deaf and Dumb, Bilind, Asylum for Idiots, Merchant Seamen's Orphan, London Orphan, Infant Orphan, British Orphan, Female Orphan, Patternoster Children, Ladies Charity School, St. Ann's, National Benevolent, and National Life-boat Institutions.

The English brig Louisa, 350 tons, with a crew of seven men, on her voyage from Llanelly to Philippeville with a cargo of coal, has been burnt at sea, off Cello, in the province of Constantia. The crew were saved and taken into Philippeville by the French despatch-boat Eurotas.

MUSIC.

The season of the Royal Italian Opera was brought to a close on Saturday last. There was a splendid performance of the "Africaine" to an overflowing house. This opera has had four representations in London, and its impression on the public has been greater and greater on each repetition. The triumph of Meyerbeer's music is all the greater for being achieved in spite of the demerits of an absurd and uninteresting drama.

Her Majesty's Theatre closes this (Saturday) evening. The series of cheap performances has been successful and profitable.

The lessee of the Royal Italian Opera has surprised the public by an announcement that he has transferred his interest in this theatre to "a public company," but will continue to act as general manager; and, moreover, that the same company has secured Lord Dudley's concert-room in Mayfair, for Thursday. The concert-room stands in need of explanations, which, it may be presumed, will be given in due time. It is enough, now, to have given rise to much speculation and conjecture. The transaction in question, whatever it may be, cannot affect Mr. Mapleson's position as lessee and manager of Her Majesty's Theatre, unless he himself is a party to it, as he has an Opera house, and we understand that it has several years to run. On its expiration both theatres may fall under one management, and a monopoly may thus be created—a result not likely to be favourable to the progress of art or the advantageous to the interests of the public.

At the general meeting of the Philharmonic Society, on the 26th of July, the following gentlemen were elected directors for the ensuing year:—Mr. G. J. Anderson, Mr. W. Macdufie, Mr. F. B. Jewson, Mr. J. B. Chatterton, Mr. C. Lucas, Mr. J. Thomas, and Mr. M. C. Wilson.

Mdlle. Adelina Patti left London, last week, for Paris: Mr. Charles Adams is engaged at the Théâtre Lyrique, Vienna; and Mdme. Arabella Goddard is residing at Boulogne.

A new German opera, "Gewitter bei Sonnenschein," by Heinrich Dorn, has been produced at Dresden with great success.

THE THEATRES.

Last week we announced that Mr. Walter Montgomery had undertaken the charge of the Haymarket for a few weeks, with the intention of leading to the production of the legitimate drama. It will be recollected that Mr. Montgomery, a season or two ago, made an essay of a similar kind at the Princess's, and met with some public encouragements. He has now better opportunities, and we support him; and, altogether, the experiment looks healthy. With Miss Atkinson at Drury Lane, Miss Heath Robertson at Sadler's Wells, Mr. Henry Marston as the Ghost, Mr. Fernandes as Laertes, and Mr. Vollaire as Polonius, the tragedy of "Hamlet" was satisfactorily performed on Saturday. It also introduced to us Mr. Alfred Nelson as Horatio, and Mr. Frank Hall Cooke, both of whom acquitted themselves well. Mr. G. F. Sinclair made an effective Claudius. Mr. Montgomery is altogether wrong in the character of Hamlet, and presents us with an exceedingly eccentric and carefully-studied representation. On Monday he appeared as Claude Melnotte, in "The Lady of Lyons," when he was received by a full house. On Tuesday the houses have been good.

The Haymarket has also varied its entertainments by the introduction of Mdlle. Emilie Von der Meersch and her marvellous birds. This is an exceedingly curious exhibition, most gracefully conducted by a young lady of considerable attractions. She has taught these birds which belong to many countries, resolve questions in arithmetic, orthography, and geography, and perform their tricks perfectly under control—obedient, docile, vigilant, and cheerful, and generally perform their tasks with accuracy.

The Industrial Exhibition at Dumedin, which was opened on Jan. 12, contained 1,200 exhibitors, of whom 204 were from abroad. The exhibitors and 1336 articles exhibited. The collection of the raw material of the Australasian colonies formed a most interesting feature, and will serve to give the exhibition almost the character of a museum. So far as this portion of the exhibition is concerned, it is interesting, as it does not contain the varied collections of natural history and classified samples of materials contributed by contemporary exhibitions. Should the Industrial Exhibitions be repeated throughout the colony and the world, these will be preserved in various local museums, and will form a nucleus, receiving constant accession from the results of future discoveries.

THE GOODWOOD RACE CUPS.

THREE of our Illustrations represent the designs of the silver cups, or pieces of plate, which formed the principal prizes won at Goodwood races last week. They were designed by Mr. Harrison Weir, of Morden, London and Ryder, New Bond street, in massive in form and elaborately ornamented. The designer, Mr. Robert Jefferson, has taken his subject from Berger's ballad of "Leonora;" and the lid of the handle forms an equestrian group of miniature stature, which represents the midnight ride of the poor maiden with her spectral lover. The handles are formed of the standard eagle who interceds for Leonora, and at the base are smiling cupids entwined with passion-flowers, all in keeping with the beautiful story. The Goodwood Cup, which has been manufactured by Messrs. R. and S. Garrard, of the Haymarket, was designed by Mr. Harrison Weir and modelled by Mr. W. Spencer. It displays a very spirited and lifelike group of the English archer, Robin Hood, standing upon the body of a deer which he has just killed, surrounded by his merry men, with his rustic horn; whilst a noble hound gives tongue as loudly in his own fashion, for the information of the belated comers who, in the chase, who have not come up in time to be "in at the death." The other Goodwood Cup was made by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. The design is a figure of Queen Elizabeth, on horseback, receiving a revolvery, which is presented to her by an attendant page in the classic garb of a huntress. A huntsman and a hound wait at her right hand.

THE LAYING OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

THE five Illustrations of the laying of the Atlantic telegraph cable, presented in this Number of our Journal, refer more directly to the operation of landing the thick shore-end of the cable, on Saturday week, at Foilhommerum Bay, in Valencia, on the south-west coast of Ireland. Before, however, we quote the account of these proceedings which we have received in his letter received last week, it will be convenient to state, from the reports of other branches of the expedition, the progress made by which this landing of the cable at Valencia was combined. As most of our readers are probably aware, the immense coil, measuring 27 statute miles in the circle of its side of the ocean, was manufactured separately from the main length of 2300 miles by Mr. W. T. Henley, of North Woolwich, and was conveyed to Valencia by a vessel bearing the name of the enterprise, Caroline, which the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company had chartered for that portion of the work. The thickness of the cable is the largest and heaviest ever made, weighing above twenty tons to the mile, and consisting of seven wires, in diameter at first, and diminishing gradually, in the last 500 yards outwards, to the ordinary size of the main deep-sea cable, which is only three-quarters of an inch. The core or heart of it is a cable precisely similar to the main length, but wrapped up in jute yarn, and covered outside by a winding of twelve strands of galvanized iron wires, three wires to the strand, and each wire a quarter of an inch thick. Its strength is estimated as equal to a breaking-strain of ninety tons. Such is the shore-end cable, the laying of which is the subject of our present Illustrations. The voyage of the Caroline to Valencia, burdened with this cumbrous section of the telegraphic line, seems to have been the most difficult and hazardous task that has yet been performed in the whole progress of the undertaking. The Great Eastern, with the main length of 2300 miles of cable stowed in three iron tanks, as lately described—making, with 7000 tons of coal and her other stores, an aggregate burden of 24,000 tons—left her anchorage at the Nore on Saturday, July 15; and, with her insufficient steam-power, had enough to do in getting down the Channel, by screw and paddles, at the rate of six or seven miles an hour; but, when the cause off the Lond's End, on the Monday, she found the Caroline, which had started ten days before, and had lain weather-bound a week in Falmouth Harbour, unable to proceed without help. The Great Eastern was then obliged to take the Caroline in tow, from the Monday to the Wednesday morning, against a rough south-westerly wind and the tremendous swell of the open Atlantic, which, though scarcely felt by the huge Great Eastern, almost overwhelmed the unhappy Caroline. There was real danger of her being swamped, or rather dragged under the sea, as she went round the south coast of Ireland, on the Tuesday night, the waves continually dashing over her decks from stem to stern, so that the men on deck were up to their waists in water. The officers and crew, who might have relieved themselves by casting off the tow-rope, endured this severe trial rather than fail to perform their part of the great work; but it must be considered that the Caroline was ill chosen for this service, and that, with better arrangements, the shore-end cable should have been safe at Valencia some time before the Great Eastern set forth. As it happened, the tow-rope accidentally breaking when a few miles off the Skelligs Rocks, at five o'clock on the Wednesday morning, the Great Eastern first arrived alone at Valencia, which is about twenty miles distant, and the Caroline made her way in as soon as she could in the forenoon of that day. The Great Eastern, after landing two or three of the official gentlemen concerned in the enterprise, went into Berehaven, in Bantry Bay, where she was to lie securely till the Caroline should have completed the laying of the shore end, in readiness to meet the Great Eastern and to form the junction with the main length of cable some twenty or thirty miles out at sea.

The Great Eastern was accompanied by H.M.S. Terrible and Sphinx, which met her at Valencia, and are to keep with her in her voyage to Newfoundland. It should have been mentioned above that the Great Eastern was assisted likewise in her start from the Nore by another of the Queen's ships, the surveying-steamer Porcupine, under Staff-Commander Calver, by whose guidance she was enabled to pass through a deep channel, recently explored and very exact, much more convenient for her than either the Swin or the Alexandra channel, ordinarily frequented by vessels leaving the Thames or Medway for the North Sea. But we must return to the Caroline, where we left her, at Foilhommerum, in Port Magee, a narrow inlet of the strait which separates the Isle of Valencia from the neighbouring coast of Kerry to the south. To that remote part of the United Kingdom, thirty or forty miles west of Killarney, had the Telegraph Construction Company suddenly removed the scene of its operations, which we noticed so lately at East Greenwich and in the dockyard properties carried forward under the eye of the London world; yet, by means of the pens of the reporters, and the pencil of our own artist, the public are now made acquainted with the minutest details of this mighty work.

The road to Valencia, either from Killarney or from Kenmare and Glengariff, at the head of Bantry Bay, was travelled not without some delays by the few persons from London who, having made the best of their way to see the landing of the cable, succeeded in getting there on the morning of Saturday week. The local staff of the Telegraph Construction Company had been engaged for some weeks past in various preparations on the spot. An encampment of the workmen was here or there to be seen along the road; and such is displayed in the first of the two series of illustrations, on page 117. These tents are pitched by the side of the road which passes along the shore of Dingle Bay towards Cahirciveen, at the foot of the Keragh mountains. The central figure in our Artist's sketch is Mr. Watlock, the superintendent of the works of the Magnetic Telegraph Company, who had charge of the line connecting Valencia with the telegraphic system throughout Ireland. The poles on which the wire is stretched have, for the most part, been replaced by new and larger ones. It happened, rather unluckily, that one of these poles had been knocked down, one day, by "an impulsive Irish cow;" others by a drunken Irish car-driver, on the very day the cable was landed, so that the news could not be transmitted to us in London quite so quickly as we should have been glad to receive it; but this defect was soon repaired.

In our Artist's second sketch, engraved on page 120, we have a most picturesque and interesting view of the actual landing of the cable from the ship Caroline in the small haven at Foilhommerum, already named. This place lies just under and within Bray Head, the mountain promontory which forms the south-west corner of the Isle of Valencia, projecting into the Atlantic Ocean. It is distant six or seven miles across the island from Knightstown, the port, which occupies a position on the strait like that of Sondesburg in the Isle of Alcen. The sketch was taken from the high ground below Cornbeg, almost at the extremity of the land. A contemporary reporter gives the description of the scenery:—"We now reach nearly at the summit of the bleak hill a low wooden hut, painted black, and not unlike the summer establishment of some watering-place photographer. This is the temporary office of the Atlantic Telegraph Company. Along the waste land, at some distance to the right, are half a dozen thatched hovels, while a few feet from the grass-grown turf-wall which divides the field containing this office from the cliff, you look down upon the Caroline, which is in communication with the land by a lengthy floating bridge of boats. To the right and left precipitous rocks rise nearly 300 ft. from the sea, so hollowed at each side as to give to the securely-sheltered little haven, which is scarcely a mile from end to end, the conformation of a horseshoe. Rugged, steep, and utterly inaccessible, save where a rude and broken path has been formed by the cablemen, there cliffs are studded with wild flowers and ferns, and variegated by large patches of the brightest verdure, which alternate with masses of tangled seaweed and huge blocks of slate and part-coloured rock. Bullet's Island, a large grass-grown strip of stony ground stretching from left to right, from the far point of the bay, lessens the opening to the sea, and naturally helps to shelter this beautiful nook, though, as there is of course neither land nor breakwater between its entrance and America, it will be readily understood that in rough weather it presents a very different appearance to the one it wore yesterday. Then all was smiling, sunny, and calm. The spectator who, after drinking in the beauties before him from the heights, scrambled down the rugged path and stood among the men hauling the cable on shore, or balanced himself on one of the crags arresting his downward path, was in a magnificent natural amphitheatre, with toiling peasants, earnest seamen, excited seamen, and eager capitalists for his actors—priests, local notary, electrician, and telegraphists for his fellow lookers-on; and the broad Atlantic for his stage. Mr. Creswick never surpassed the rich hues and bright tints of the rocks and vegetation around; Frith never painted brighter eyes, more supple figures, or more picturesquely artistic costumes than those of the barefooted nymphs assembled to look at Pat or Mike 'helping the tiligraph gintlemin;' Stanfield never transferred to canvas a more beautiful and varied sea-piece than the one before us. On the highest pinnacle of the cliff, to the right, the country people had planted a succession of improvised flags, consisting of coloured pocket-handkerchiefs, scarlet cloaks, blankets, petticoats, and what not, which fluttered gaily in the breeze, while all round the summit a long fringe of lookers-on stood out sharp and clear against the blue sky, some mounted, some squatted on the ground, dotheen in mouth, some gesticulating in little groups, and all manifesting the keenest interest in the proceedings of the day. The peasant's notion of the mysterious wire is that it will somehow bring him nearer to the land of promise. Every Irish labourer tells you of the relatives or friends who have preceded in America; and no man or woman here seems too old or feeble to hope for the day when their savings will amount to 'five or six pounds, yer honour,' that they may bid the old country good-by and begin the world anew. The telegraphic colours, represented by rosettes of red, white, and blue, made and presented by Lady Capel Molyneux, decorated the coats or hats of those immediately interested in the enterprise; and, out of the three or four hundred employed on the boats and shore to assist in hauling the cable in, it is scarcely necessary to say no two figures were attired alike. The high-collared, swallow-tailed blue coat—new, perhaps, before the electric telegraph was invented, and sadly soiled and threadbare now—worked side by side with the ragged nondescript garment which had been fustian, but had reached the stage of hardly-kept-together tatters. Shirts which blushed darkly at being exposed; jersies blue, red, and brown; caps and hats of every variety and shape; bare heads, bare legs, and feet, and arms, made up the lines. The boats were similarly manned, and continued this line from the stern of the Caroline, some 700 yards off, so that the cable was passed literally from hand to hand from ship to shore." The appearance of the long row of boats was very striking, and they varied from the smart cutters of the ships and the trim gig of the coastguard to the ordinary fishing-boat of the coast. Besides those which formed the line, having eight or ten men, labourers or fishermen, in each boat, to hand the cable along, there were detached boats passing up and down, with the experienced persons who were to direct the landing—about thirty-five boats in all. On shore, where a trench, 3 ft. deep, had been cut across the narrow beach and up the face of the cliff, to receive the cable, a hundred or more of the country people, encouraged by the presence of their popular landlord, Mr. Fitzgerald, the Knight of Kerry, were pulling and shouting in their Irish fashion, with the utmost enthusiasm, but with less discretion—for, not being aware that it was necessary to bring in and lodge upon the beach a certain quantity of cable in excess of the distance from the ship to the shore, in order that it might be passed up the cliff and across a couple of fields to the Telegraph House, then Irishmen, as soon as they got hold of the end of the future line of communication with America, threw it upon the ground, and raised a wild "Hurroo!" This was caught and repeated by the crews of the boats, who, concluding that their work was well done, at once proceeded to leave the massive rope like the sea. From boat to boat the first had example was followed by all until, to the dismay of the onlookers, who could not gain a hearing amid the continued cheers, every fathom up to the stern of the Caroline was thrown overboard. The result of this touching enthusiasm was that every foot had to be undersun, preparatory to the whole operation beginning de novo. It took some time to effect this, during which the Irish were silent enough.

"When the cable had been undersun, hauled into the boats again, and the shore end ready to come on land, and was stowed away in gigantic circles at the foot of the cliff, the scene was one of extraordinary animation. Numbers of men were in the water up to their waists or shoulders easing the cable over the rocks, while along the steep path up the cliff was a close row of figures, men and boys, of every rank, from the well-to-do farmer down to the poorest cottier, all pulling at the cable with a will, and, as if in atonement for their first fault of enthusiasm, obeying with silent and almost childlike docility every signal made by Mr. Glass or Mr. Canning as to when they were to haul or slack away." Mr. Temple, assistant to Mr. Canning, with another of the staff, was in the water up to his neck working as hard as any. By twelve o'clock the cable was well up the groove which had been cut in the face of the cliff for its reception; and from that point the work of carrying its massive coils across the meadows to the Telegraph House beyond was soon accomplished; and at a little before one o'clock the end, taken over roads, hedges, and ditches, was brought close up to the house, or hut, a galvanic wooden building, already mentioned, which is shown in our Illustration on page 124. Here several of the gentlemen chiefly interested in the great enterprise were assembled, with Sir Robert Peel, Chief Secretary to the Government of Ireland, and Lord John Hay, who had both come with the Knight of Kerry, having, as well as Mr. Glass, the managing director of the Telegraph Construction Company (and manufacturer of the main length of cable) been the guests of the Knight of Kerry, at his mansion of Glenleam, Knightstown. The simple ceremony with which the cable was introduced to the telegraph station has not been noticed by other reporters, but our Artist says, "The end of the cable was taken up by Mr. Glass and handed to Sir Robert Peel, who passed it through a hole left for the purpose in the building which forms, pro tem., the station, where it was speedily connected with the batteries in the instrument-room. A signal was then interchanged with the Caroline, proving that the electric communication was perfect. Three cheers for the Queen were called for meanwhile, and given with Irish warmth. The Knight of Kerry briefly addressed the large concourse of ladies and gentlemen, yeomen and peasantry, now gathered about him. He expressed his gratification at this auspicious commencement of the work, and called for three cheers for the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, and three cheers for Sir Robert Peel. These were most heartily given, and, of course, were followed by a speech from Sir Robert Peel. (See our Illustration above.) He spoke, with his wonted energy, of the political, social, and commercial benefits which would be secured if the cable should prove successful; and, after invoking the aid of Divine Providence, called for three cheers for the Queen and three for Mr. Glass. In replying, Mr. Glass said that all human skill could achieve had been applied to the furtherance of the object, which he hoped was now near its consummation. Sir R. Peel having called for three cheers for the President of the United States, and the Doxology having been sung, Mr. Glass formally announced the success of the test that had been just applied, and then the men returned to the beach and filled in the trench in which the cable lay. Soon after twelve the Hawk arrived from Knightstown, and towed the Caroline out of the bay to lay the cable, which was done slowly but safely, under the able superintendence of Mr. Canning, chief engineer of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company, assisted by Mr. Henley and Captain White, the officer commanding the Coastguard stations along this coast, and who has devoted much care and attention to obtaining correct soundings along the route to be taken by the shore end. The Caroline started from the bay at 2.10 p.m. (Dublin time). The Illustration on page 121 shows the people watching her from the shore. Telegrams were constantly received from the Caroline at Foilhommerum station, showing that all was going on well. The Illustration on page 117 shows the reception of the telegrams, and the interior of the instrument-room at the station, which will, in fact, remain in a similar state until the whole ocean cable is successfully laid, when the line will be handed over by the Construction and Maintenance Company to the Atlantic Telegraph Company, and the instruments (Professor Thomson's) now used, and which are correctly shown in our present Engraving, will be taken away and a different description of instrument made use of for the general purposes of transmission of messages. It was nearly twelve o'clock at night when a message was received by Mr. Glass that the Caroline had laid the whole of the shore-end cable with perfect success, and that its electric continuity was quite perfect.

On the next day (Sunday week) the operation of joining the shore end of the cable to the main length was performed at about fifteen miles beyond the most western of the ragged rocks on the coast of Ireland. Here the Great Eastern, attended by the Terrible and Sphinx, was approached by the Caroline, bearing the last half mile of the shore end. The spectators of the work were on board the Hawk, a steam-yacht belonging to Mr. Glass, which came upon the scene as the cable was being drawn from the stern of the Great Eastern to the Caroline. Among those on board the Hawk were Lord John Hay; Sir R. Peel, M.P.; the Knight of Kerry, with his daughters, the Misses Fitzgerald; Captain White, R.N.; and Captain Hamilton; with Mr. W. H. Russell and Mr. Robert Dudley, who are appointed to be the historian and the artistic illustrator of the voyage of the Great Eastern across the Atlantic. It is to Mr. Dudley's pencil that we owe the Sketches engraved. Soon after one o'clock the coils of the deep-sea cable were safely wound on board the Caroline, and the work of splicing them at once commenced. This was done by stripping both ends of hemp, outside wires, and gutta-percha for a short distance, till the copper conductor of the line was laid bare, and pared down to a fine wedge-shaped point at each end. The connecting conductors were then overlapped in the form known as a "scarf" joint, and firmly bound together with fine threads of copper wire, till the junction was made even stronger than the main portions of the line. The threads and conductor were then soldered together thickly, and strips of soft gutta-percha, like bands of brown tape, were wound layer over layer, and their edges closely pressed, so as to form one homogeneous mass, till a certain thickness was completed. Then came a coating of insulated material called Chatterton's compound, and then again another layer of gutta-percha tape, until the whole was inclosed in four rings of the gutta-percha and three of the compound. The joint was then immersed in cold water for testing, and, the signals proving perfect, the last protection of hemp and outside wire was added, and the joint sunk again into the sea, that its perfectness as to conductivity and insulation might be ascertained from the extreme end of the whole length of the cable on board the Great Eastern. It was past four o'clock before the last of these tests was concluded, and in every case they proved to be most satisfactory. At 4.30 the signal was given and the last fastenings which held it to the Caroline were cast adrift, and, with a great splash, the final joint of the Atlantic telegraph and the first thirty miles of its length went down slowly into the blue water, the depth here being 100 fathoms. The Hawk then gave the Great Eastern a parting cheer; the Great Eastern fired a salute of three guns, took a turn ahead, and was fairly off; floating from her trucks she bore the white jack, an American ensign, the burgee of the company—the union jack and American stars quartered together, the words "Atlantic Telegraph," being on the fail; a red ensign, a union jack, and the French flag; and from her peak the blue ensign, which she flies because Captain Anderson is an officer of the naval reserve. In the five ships thus lying near together all the British ensigns were used, the Caroline having red, the Great Eastern and the Hawk blue, the latter because she ranks as a yacht, and the two men-of-war white. Just before the start, the Captain of the Terrible, who was on board the Great Eastern, expelling with Captain Anderson, returned to his own ship, which presently took her place on the starboard quarter of the big vessel, the Sphinx taking the port quarter; and so they went away to the West. The Caroline had before this turned her head to the shore, and now the Hawk followed, and soon caught her; the Great Eastern and the men-of-war, which had been passing out of sight on the horizon, were by this time discernible only by the bank of cloudlike smoke which lay in the golden pathway of the setting sun.

We expect to receive from our Artist, who is on board the Great Eastern, further Illustrations of the most interesting scenes in the progress of this grand enterprise.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.

THE panic which has seized the agricultural mind and is rapidly communicating itself to that of the public at large, occasioned by the eruption, in London and elsewhere, of a contagious and fatal disease incident to the ox tribe, is too well grounded to be treated with levity. It may be excessive; but in this case, happily, alarm, instead of conducing to the evil from which it takes its rise, tends rather to contribute to the means of its abatement. If the plague had stricken men instead of cattle—if Russia had transmitted to us the epidemic which raged at St. Petersburg a few months back instead of this steppe murrain, or Rinderpest, which, there is reason to believe, has crossed over to us from her herds; or if there had been another outbreak of the cholera—the wider the apprehension and the more intense the fear, the more susceptible as well as abundant would have been the predisposing causes which provide fuel for the flame. It would then have been the duty of all who have access to the public mind to soothe excitement, to dissipate terror, and, if possible, to arm all classes with that calm fortitude which is the best prophylactic against pestilential visitations. In the present instance, however, alarm, even if it be unreasonable in its extent, can do nothing towards increasing the prevalence or aggravating the characteristics of the disease. The apprehensions of stockowners, graziers, and dairymen cannot spread amongst their cattle; but will probably ensure the promptest and most energetic application of every method of prevention, as well as cure, within the reach of veterinary science. Since the pest has obtained a lodgment in this country, it is not, perhaps, to be regretted that the earliest manifestations of it should have effectually frightened those whose property it threatens.

That the disease has been imported from the Continent is the conclusion which we hold to be the most consonant with the known facts of the case. There is not the smallest doubt that it is highly contagious, nor, we believe, that it made its first appearance in this country in a metropolitan dairy shortly after the introduction into it of two Dutch cows. Hitherto, its severest ravages have been restricted to the cow-houses of London, in which, it is said, upwards of two thousand animals have already perished. It may be, therefore, that it is now impracticable, to follow the trail of the disease to all the places in which it has since made itself visible; but it can be traced in a sufficient number of instances to sustain the hypothesis of its importation. Although it is true that it has attacked herds reported to have been quite insulated from before the date of its outbreak, it has not, we think, been proved that it was impossible for such herds to have received the malady by accidental contact with some substance capable of retaining and communicating its poisonous germs. It it had derived its existence from unknown atmospheric causes, it is not reasonable inference that its development would not have been so partial; and it is certainly worthy of note that hitherto it has made its appearance in localities known to have more or less immediate communication with the London cow-sheds. In these eastern ports at which cattle are disembarked. There are facts difficult to be accounted for on either hypothesis; but that which attributes the plague to the importation of infected cattle and to its spread by contagion is the one which has the larger bulk of evidence, and, if inadequate, would by this time, we imagine, have completely broken down.

But, if the popularly-received account of its origin be the true one, as preponderant appearances occasionally imply, then there is good ground for confidence that its further ravages may be soon stayed and the serious calamity which threatens the country in the shape of a high price of food may be nipped in the bud. The two conditions on which the rapid extension of the murrain depends are scarcely more indispensable than they are practicable. The first is to destroy on the instant the taint wherever and as soon as its presence is detected; the other is to prevent fresh seeds of the disease from being brought to us from abroad. How the former may best be done we have recent experience to teach us. About two years ago, if we remember aright, Mr. Gladstone proposed wholesale destruction to the sheep of the country. It was found necessary to make it more to the interest of every flockmaster immediately to sacrifice the infected than to conceal the fact of infection. A mutual assurance society was organised, by which, on due compliance with certain rules, two thirds or thereabouts of the value of the sheep killed on account of the disease was guaranteed to the owner. The effect was that the closest inspection of the flocks was courted, and the infected animals were slaughtered and buried as soon as the first symptoms of the complaint were discovered. We are glad to observe that the measure which proved so effectual in the case of sheep is being enacted in that of cattle; and we trust it may be followed by similar results. But it is of small avail to kill out the plague at home if it is to be resuscitated by indiscriminate arrivals from abroad. To put a sudden stop to the importation of foreign cattle would be a precaution unnecessarily stringent—to subject them to well-considered quarantine regulations would probably answer all the purposes desired. The expence is urgent enough to warrant the assumption and expense by her Majesty's Privy Council of a larger authority in this matter than they legally possess, and to trust to Parliament for indemnification. By promptitude and decision on the part of the private interests affected, as well as of public authority, there is ground for believing that the plague may be fenced round, and speedily as well as completely extirpated.

Hitherto, so far at least as can be judged by the information given to the public, the pestilence has not spread beyond the limits of possible management. Should it be allowed to do so, it may, as Professor Simonds suggests, "assume a magnitude rightly to be regarded as a great national calamity." When the same complaint visited England a hundred and twenty-five years ago, 40,000 cattle are computed to have perished of it in six months. If the mortality was so great at a period of so little locomotion as that referred to, what proportions might it not reach in our day, when almost every district of the kingdom is in easy communication with the metropolis, and, through it, with every other district, and when every cattle-truck on the railways may carry with it the fatal virus! A prospective possibility of losing half our herds, or, indeed, of having them thinned to any serious extent, would be a blow to agriculturists merely, but the entire community, look and feel serious. The drought of last year, by increasing largely the expense of feeding stock, has already raised the price of butchers' meat to a high rate; and a society of animals which cannot spread under a rapidly increasing population more than it did in days of yore. Such has been the expansion of commerce and manufacture, and so remunerative has employment been of late, that a considerable palatable food, for the working people have become meat-eaters, and consumption presses hard upon our sources of supply. Should these be suddenly drawn upon by disease, prices would go up to an unprecedented height and effectually shut the market against the class to whose physical well-being a substantial diet is indispensable. The evil, unfortunately, would not be restricted to the meat market. All the articles of food would proportionately rise in price, and even the privation which would have to be borne by those whose means are now but barely sufficient for their wants would be terrible.

To this alarming extent, however, the present infliction, we trust, is not destined to proceed. "Forewarned is forearmed." Fear is the mother of precaution; and in this instance there is reason to hope pressision will be the precursor of safety. If so, one may be forgiven even for being excited by that which is now the importance of which may be regarded as some compensation for the fright, the temporary inconvenience, and the actual loss which attend it. It has already attracted public sympathy to the miserable condition of our cow-houses and civilisation, and which need only to be generally known to be put an end to. This is something; but we look for much more. As a nation, we have various and abundant food-resources and ways and means at our command which, if not all are wholly neglected. Our streams ought to teem with fish, as once they did, and as they may be made to do again. Our coasts, but especially those of Ireland, might yield an unfailing supply of edible crustacea. Our rivers and lakes might be multiplied tenfold. Even our butchers' meat might be made to go as far again by economy and skill in cooking. Countless herds of cattle, both in South America and in our Australian colonies, are valued for their hides and tallow merely, the ingenuity which might preserve, without greatly deteriorating, their fleshly virtues, and the enterprise which will put them down, at a moderate price, at our seaports, are at present all but wholly neglected for food supply. We are sadly behindhand in the philosophy both of the larder and the kitchen; and, should this cattle plague force us to cultivate it to better purpose, it will not have been sent in vain.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Emperor left Plombières on Thursday morning for the camp at Châlons. A fete was given last week by the municipality of Plombières in honour of Queen Hortense, in the town. Public dancing was greatly cheered.

The Imperial Guard, brigade of cavalry of the Guard, commanded by General du Barail, took place on the race-ground of Fontainbleau yesterday week. The Emperor arrived on horseback, attended by Princess Anna Murat, Countess de Lourmel; Baron de Pierres, First Equerry; General Waubert de Genlis, Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor; and other officers.

The Empress went to Paris on Saturday and paid a visit to the Grand Duchess of Baden at the Hotel du Louvre. Her Majesty returned to Fontainebleau at five, and the Grand Duchess took her departure for Germany at eight o'clock that evening. The Duke had come from that watering-place to meet her.

The Duke de Morny, the Emperor's brother, who is staying with her Majesty, has completely recovered from the operation performed on her eyes.

The Duchess of Sutherland has arrived at Vichy with her son Lord Leveson Gower and her daughter Lady Blanche Egerton. Her Grace and party occupy one of the Empress's chalets.

The Emperor and Empress of the King of Portugal that experiments will be made at the camp of Châlons on his Portuguese Majesty's newly-invented cannon, and has invited him to be present.

The Cherbourg papers publish the programme of the fêtes about to be held there. The English fleet is expected on the 11th. On the 15th a dinner will be given by the Minister of Marine at the Hôtel de Ville, and there will be a popular festival and fireworks; on the 16th, dinner and concert at the Admiralty, and the departments will be lighted on board the Magenta and a grand ball at the Hôtel de Ville; and on the 17th the fleet will leave for Brest.

M. Thouvenel is named Grand Referendary of the Senate, replacing the late Count d'Horrière.

Admiral Willaumez has been nominated Senator.

The annual public sitting of the French Academy was held, on Thursday week, in that of the Institut, for conferring the Prix Montlyon; an old soldier, a monthly nurse, and a poor curate were proclaimed; for the last-named the three prominent benefactors of humanity in the neighbourhood of Paris. Their respective good deeds were enumerated by the Secretary, and they received the legacy bequeathed by Marquis de Montlyon in trust to the academy.

At the distribution of prizes at the Conservatoire of Music, M. Davay announced that the works of the future laureates for the general competition of 1866 would be—Poetry, and the department which had before the committee of the Universal Exhibition. He invited foreign countries to take part in this competition.

Abd-el-Kader has returned to Paris from London.

The Second Congress of France has met at Rome for its thirty-second session. The Hall of the Palace of the Consuls was transformed into a conference room.

Colonel Laborde, the last survivor of the officers of the "Old Guard" of the French Empire, and who accompanied the first Emperor to Elba, has just died, in his eighty-fifth year, at the Palace of the Luxembourg, to which he was appointed governor on the accession of the present Sovereign to the chair of president.

The Council of State is commissioned to make a report to the Emperor upon the old laws of France relative to the right of meeting, and upon the present state of the law on the subject in the different countries of Europe.

The Minister of the Interior has addressed a circular to the Prefects expressing the satisfaction of the Government at the result which has followed the recent municipal elections. The Minister especially praises the "admirable tranquillity" with which the elections were conducted, and adds that the Government does not regard any party as "vanquished or victors," but receives all re-elected or newly elected with the same cordiality.

The report of the committee appointed under the presidency of the Empress to inquire into the penitentiary system adopted with young convicts in the department of the Seine has been published. It decides against the course of treatment pursued in La Roquette prison, and in favour of the agricultural colony system.

The Assize Court of Corsica has condemned to death Jean Maurese, charged with the murder of six persons in the commune of Farali.

French influence is reported to be making way in Cochin-China, and several native chiefs have submitted to it. The French Governor's report affirms this influence to be purely moral.

SPAIN.

The Queen arrived at Zarauz yesterday week, and met with a reception which is described as enthusiastic. The Court is expected to return to the capital by the end of the present month. The Madrid Gazette announces the appointment of Senor Augusto Ulloa as Spanish Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Denmark, vice Count de Reus, and King of Italy. On Saturday the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs received Marquis Tapoli, the Italian Minister recently appointed to Madrid.

The Marquis of Molins and Prince Anglona have been appointed Ministers—the former at the Court of London and the latter at Vienna.

DENMARK AND SWEDEN.

The King of Denmark, accompanied by Princess Frederick, returned to Copenhagen, on Monday week, from an interview with the King and Queen of Sweden, in the province of Schonen. The King also visited the Industrial Exhibition recently opened at Malmö, and was enthusiastically received by the Danish exhibitors. His brother the King of Sweden drove several miles on the road, from the Sunnerbo Manor at Berkeskog to Malmö, to meet his Royal guest.

On Thursday week the King of Sweden and Prince Augustus arrived at Bernstorff Castle on a visit to the King of Denmark.

Princess Sophia, wife of Prince Oscar of Sweden, has been delivered of a son.

RUSSIA.

In a manifesto of the Emperor addressed to his subjects, dated the 2nd inst., he announces the fact of his second son, inaugural his successor, having taken the oath of allegiance.

The Journal de St. Petersbourg gives the following details respecting the solemnity of taking the oath of fidelity by the Hereditary Grand Duke Alexander on the occasion of his majority. The Grand Duke, heir to the Imperial throne, having entered on his fourteenth year on the 10th of March last, the 20th of July was fixed for the ceremony of the solemn fidelity to the Emperor and to the country, as well as to maintain the established order of succession :—

The day was ushered in by the firing of all the bells in the churches, and before noon the Imperial Guard and detachments from the army marched to the Winter Palace, in the grand court of which the ceremony was to take place. Before one o'clock all the dignitaries of the Orthodox Church, of the Roman Catholic Church, and of the Protestant communities, had assembled in the sanctuary of the chapel. At one precisely General Pivoutaine, Prince Paul Lieven, and Count Adlerberg, entered the chapel, bearing the Imperial insignia on velvet cushions, and deposited them on a table prepared for the purpose. Immediately after the diplomatic body entered, preceded by the Duke d'Ormea, the Spanish Ambassador; next came the high dignitaries of the Empire, headed by Prince Gortschakoff, Count Orloff, and Count Adlerberg. After all these had taken their seats, the Emperor and the Empress, followed by the Imperial family, arrived and were met at the door by the Metropolitan of St. Petersburg, Isidore, and the clergy. As soon as the Imperial family had taken their places the service commenced. When the time came for the Grand Duke to take the oath, the Emperor conducted him to a desk on which lay a crucifix and the Holy Gospels. The Metropolitan handed the formula of the oath to the Grand Duke, who read it in a loud voice, and with his right raised towards heaven, repeated the words. The Metropolitan then presented the Imperial Deed of Succession, which the Grand Duke then bowed low to the Emperor, who stepped forward and endorsed it with his signature. Immediately after the ceremony was over the bells rang forth joyfully. After the termination of the service the corps was again formed and proceeded to the Theune-room, where, as soon as the Emperor had taken his seat on the throne, the Grand Duke took the oath and to serve his Imperial Majesty faithfully according to all the military regulations. After the oath had been administered to the Empress, the Winter Palace and vent to the palace of Tchagnino. On the occasion of taking the oath the Grand Duke, by an ukase, was inscribed on the muster roll of the regiments and corps of which his Majesty is chief and of which his Imperial Highness did not already form part.

UNITED STATES.

President Johnson has ordered the liberation of all prisoners of war, including Generals, upon their taking the oath of allegiance. All the prisoners at Fort Warren, except ex-Vice-President Stephens and Postmaster Regan, have been released on parole. Among those recently released from that and other points are Generals Ewell, Corse, Barton, Reynolds, Clark, and Edwin Johnson.

Conflicts between the citizens and returned Confederate soldiers continue throughout Kentucky. Guerillas still infest Central Tennessee. Governor Brownlow has requested General Thomas to send troops into the disturbed districts to maintain peace order during the elections.

The majority of the Secession candidates have been elected in Virginia.

The Secretary for War has declared null and void all orders of military commanders in the south imposing restraints and punishments on coloured freedmen to which whites are not subjected.

It is reported that the Mexican treaty existing between the Federal soldiers and the French troops along the Mexican frontier is on the increase; and it was stated at Galveston that the Mexican Government had ordered accoutrements for 35,000 men to be prepared at Matamoros, in consequence of the encroachments of Federal troops above Brownsville.

The New York Zouaves at Charleston have mutinied and been disarmed. Their officers have refused to lead to good and bad Fort Sumter. The affair arose out of the late disturbances with the negroes.

The launch of the Monadnock, Dunderberg, and Shawsheen Mountain has successfully effected, on the 22nd ult., from the shipyard of Mr. William H. Webb, New York. She is a seagoing iron-clad ram-frigate, of over 4000 tons burden-power. She is to carry four 15-inch guns or four 15-inch Rodman and fourteen 11-inch Dahlgren guns. Her length is 300 ft. and her breadth of beam nearly 73 ft. The weight of her armour is 1000 tons. Her contract guarantees fifteen miles per hour as a speed.

The Secretary of the Navy has ordered the reduction of the Atlantic squadron to ten and the Mediterranean squadron to five vessels.

A young woman named Harris, who was "courted" by a man named Burroughs, and who killed him with a revolver, without intending her of his intention, he married another, has just been acquitted at Washington, after a trial which occupied several days and filled the court-house in the papers. The murder was committed in the Treasury building, in the presence of numerous witnesses. The murderess made an attempt to escape by jumping from a very announced their verdict "Not guilty," a tremendous roar of applause went up in the crowded chamber—Judge, jury, defendant, counsel, and spectators joining in a common shout. The woman Harris fainted in the arms of one of her counsellors, who kissed her passionately, and, after repeating her to consciousness, led her from the court-room. Bouquets were showered upon her as she passed along—men and women rushed forward to grasp her hand or to kiss her.

The Confederate cruiser Shenandoah is still afloat and carrying on her depredations against Federal shipping in the North Pacific. The Captain was informed of the termination of the war, but discredited it.

INDIA.

The Hon. William Muir has been appointed by the Viceroy Secretary of the Order of the Star of India.

The celebrated rock fortress of Gwalior has been formally made over by Scindia to the India Government, and is now garrisoned by European troops.

There has been a battle between the forces of the Ameer of Cabul and those of the Candahar chiefs; but all we are told of the result is that the heir apparent of the Ameer of Cabul and the leader of the Candaharees had both been killed.

Cholera had broken out at Baroda and several other places in India, and also at Aden and in the neighbouring Arab territories.

The aspect of commercial affairs, we are told, was improving, and land and bank shares had risen considerably.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

We have news from Shanghai to June 22. Fresh edicts published in Pekin show that Prince Kung had not entirely recovered from his late disgrace. Sankelinsin has been killed in an encampment with the Nienfei rebels. Zeangkaukee succeeds him. Burgevine has been captured near Amoy while attempting to join the rebels. He is detained prisoner by the Taotai of Foochow. The silk and tea trades have opened briskly at Shanghai and Foochow.

The Japanese Japan announces that commercial affairs are progressing satisfactorily. The Tycoon had determined to attack Prince Nagato, and had received 100,000 troops. It was rumoured that Prince Satsuma intended to join Nagato.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

We are in the same state of anxious doubt regarding the condition of the Atlantic telegraph cable as we were left on Thursday week, when, as stated in our last Publication, "the cable was communicating with the Great Eastern" was the saddening tidings received from Valencia, rendered the more painful by following so closely upon the previous repeated telegrams, "All going on well." At the time of our going to press vesterday (Friday) Edition, on Thursday night, Mr. Canning had not arrived as it was thought she might, off Valencia, nor had any communication from or news of her been received.

It seems that a "magnetic storm" came on about the time the signals ceased; and the Astronomer Royal, observing its violence, was of opinion that it might account for the cessation of electric communication. Yesterday week, however, at 4.30 p.m. test was made from the under-sea cable to the shore, and to the official there without special instruction, and the result was that the telegraphist—"Test taker for credentials" Bonelli shows accident to the cable, and total cessation or dead earth, 1250 miles from Valencia." The following telegram has subsequently been received from Mr. Glass, managing director of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company (Limited) :—

VALENCIA, August 7.—"My's tests to-day, with battery power of 1176 miles, taking the temperature of the water at 31. I think the last distance telegraphed is right."

The logbooks of the Persia and the North American, between whom ecurses the Great Eastern probably was, show that on the day the fault or fractures took place the ships were in a dead calm as to storm.

The shareholders in the Atlantic Telegraph Company held a special meeting on Wednesday, when resolutions were passed increasing the shares into stock, and issuing £800,000 of shares, at a preferential dividend of 8 per cent, for completing and working cable, and for constructing a second to be worked along with it.

The Queen of Portugal and the infant Prince are progressing very satisfactorily.

The Viceroy of Egypt arrived at Alexandria on the 3rd inst. After having received some official visits, his Highness left for Cairo.

Three workships for the manufacture of counterfeit Spanish money have been discovered in Rome, and numerous arrests made.

The Emperor of Austria, the King of Bavaria, and the Grand Duke of Hesse have accepted an invitation to attend the Carlsruhe rifle meeting, which will be held at Starkburg from the 15th to the 19th inst. The King of Prussia is expected to arrive there on the 16th inst.

At Florence an extremely-full municipal council has confirmed, by a unanimous vote, the cession of Nice to France, a measure which is recommended in the report of the former Minister, Peruzzi, and embodied in the answer to the Gonfaloniere which was carried to Fontainebleau, Cresweil, and Breda.

A return has been issued of the number of electors on the register of each county in England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland. The total number of electors in the United Kingdom is 1,056,289. In 1857 in England there are 499,817, of whom 312,564 are freeholders, 79,177 copyholders, 64,100 leaseholders, and 44,076 householders, 337 who pay £20 are qualified by offices, 19,486 are set down as possessing joint qualifications, and 34,177 "miscellaneous." Wales has 19,000 in all, of which 11,000 are freeholders and 5937 occupying tenants; the remainder are copyholders, fundholders, annuitants, and with other qualifications. Ireland has 44,000, and more voters are registered than in Wales. There are 48,504 in all. Of these 22,435 are freeholders, and 14,000 are occupiers. Of the rest 3000 are holders, while there are 2941 life-renters. Ireland registers 172,019 voters throughout Scotland, the far greater proportion of whom are £10 voters, of whom there are 160,936; there are 5232 freeholders, 1166 who hold lease of 57 years longer, and 3 under octogenarian tenure.

The Paris Tribunal of Correctional Police has been engaged for three days in trying a number of persons charged with a conspiracy. Orsini de Narcaud, aged fifty, a lady who at one time possessed a fortune of nearly 80,000 a year, and who numbered among her friends the Duchess of Abrantes Simonnet, were charged as accomplices. It appeared that the conspirators had met at the house of Simonnet with her knowledge, at the Chalet de la Fraude (Les Intérêts), but their meetings had not been publicly noticed to obtain office. In that year she went to Paris for the purpose of prosecuting a lawsuit, in which she and her husband were engaged. Soon after her arrival at the capital she borrowed various large sums of money, part of which was eventually spent in purchasing various articles of jewellery and other objectionable expedients. In the first place, she purchased from M. Kremmer, a jeweller, a diamond necklace, worth 2000 francs. The payment was pronced, but ultimately recovered by the jeweller with a loss of 520f. M. Kramner had no reason to let the jeweller have the necklace on credit. At the presentation, and those of her two accomplices that she was a lady of great wealth, and that she had a large income. She also, in the presence of Mr. Knowles, aided by the other prisoners, had the power of conjuring out of court. From the firm of Guillin-Gignoux, drapers, they obtained shawls worth 7101f.; and M. Lainé, another draper, 1500f. In the latter transaction, in short, the total value of the goods fraudulently obtained by the prisoners was 15s.91f., and they had less to their credit than 11,717f. The Tribunal condemned the Countess to three years' imprisonment, the woman Gratmaller to two years, and Simonnet to three months' imprisonment each in 16f. fine and costs.

The Emperor of Mexico has addressed a letter to his Ministers of Education and Public Worship in which he says:—"It is my firm will to place public education in the Mexican empire on the same basis as the experience gained by the most advanced peoples—upon a footing which will place us in the rank of the foremost nations. In order to attain to that supposition, you should bear in mind that education must be accessible to all, must be public, that is to say, as far as possible gratuitous, and must be moral and obligatory. Secondary instruction must be so organised as to offer, on the one hand, to the middle class of citizens the means of preparing itself for society, to serve as a necessary basis for superior and special studies. The superior instruction must be complete, and the professorships must not be enclosed as at present in a most restricted circle. Besides, in order to the basis of all humanising education, constitute at the same time an intellectual exercise and a moral exercise. The study of the fine arts, especially of archæology, absolutely indispensable to a people which desires to take part in the estimate of the world and to keep up with the progress of the other peoples, especially if we take into account the exceptional proportions, position of the country. Lastly, the moral education must have the characteristic sign of its epoch which supplies itself in reality; for it teaches us to know ourselves, to love our fellow-men, to respect the rights of others, and all the virtues which are necessary in the world for the accomplishment of duty. With that attention should be carefully directed to physical education and the harmony of its development. With regard to primary instruction, I consider that special schools are necessary to their advantageous development. Thus, in the Middle Ages we saw the Church open in its bosom, as it were, a term devoid of sense. In establishing these special schools, you should take care that in them the diversity of professions may be taught, whether theoretical and practical sciences and of the arts are represented. It is important that primary attention should be directed to the fact that there exists little known to our country—i.e., of philosophy, because it exercises the intellect, teaches us how to govern himself, and to comprehend ourselves, emanating from the study of himself in the most order of society. I wish that you should not lose sight of the circumstance that the Mexican people is Religious in a high degree, and every measure contrary to that tendency inferes in religious questions the more does it remain faithful to its mission. We have given liberty to the Church in its own sphere, and I wish to secure to the former the full use of its legislative rights, and at the same time entire liberty in the exercise and formation of its priests according to its own rules, and without any interference of the State; but duties of which we have mentioned above only are not less incumbent upon the Church, in which the clergy of the country have to fulfil a most scrupulously exact participation in our laws. You will consequently be guided in your plans and your proposals by the principles that religion in the Church and the Government ought to be united in the bonds of peace, the respective parts, according to the text-book accepted by the Government. Examinations in all educational establishments must be regulated upon the new plan, carried out with strict exactitude, and always submitted public; but if, upon the one hand, we wish henceforth to require solid and free education from our students youth, this imposes upon us, on the other hand, the duty of furnishing them with good professors and good means of instruction. You will, consequently, be especially mindful of the necessity of forming distinguished professors for the establishment of normal schools, in which I wish to see the instruction carried out in the most complete manner. I also wish that the Ministry I desire you to procure for the schools good books of instruction, which I consider particularly important."

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

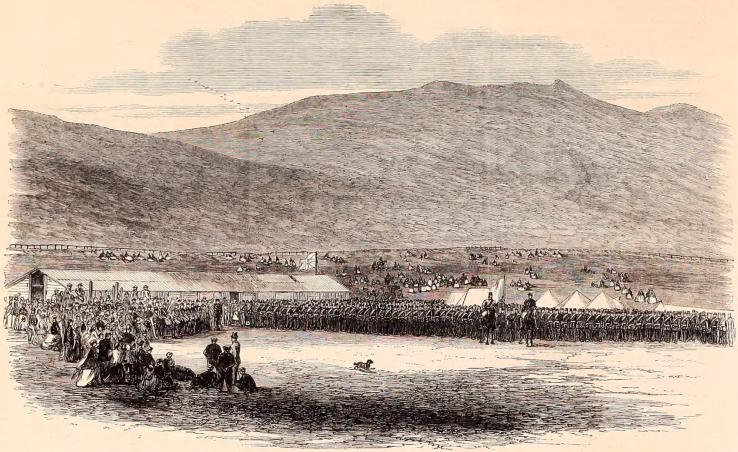
On Monday, the annual festival of the choirs of the deaneries of Bromham and Maidenhead, numbering about 500 voices, was held in Eton College Chapel.

At Waters Upton, Salop, a new church, dedicated to St. Michael, has been built from the plans of Mr. Street, at an expense of £3000. It is an Early English building, with nave and chancel, surmounted by a small bell-gable. The accommodation is for 150 persons, about the seats being free. The work has been accomplished through the exertions of the Rev. J. T. Bull, the vicar, and the parishioners for many years.

The new twenty-ninth nation, as suggested by the heads of the Established Church, has now published the Convocation Act, as amended form, as a part of the correspondence on the subject between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Queen. The Royal Commission directed the amended canon to be laid before the law officers of the Crown for their consideration, and to be guided by their report in any further step with respect to it.

On Saturday the first stone of St. Saviour's Church, Croydon, was laid by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The building, when completed, will consist of a nave, with north and south aisles, transepts, and apsidal chancel and aisles, the latter devoted to the sacristy on the north and seats for children on the south. The accommodation provided will be for 1000 persons. It is proposed to extend the church to the westward, with tower and spire, when funds to the extent of 8000. are forthcoming.

Ordinations are announced to be held on St. Matthew's Day by the Bishop of Lichfield; on Sunday, Sept. 24, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Durham, St. David's, Manchester, Llandaff, Salisbury, Ripon, Worcester, Gloucester and Bristol, Oxford, Chichester, by the Bishop of Ely; on Sunday, Dec. 17, by the Archbishop of York and Bishop of Chester; on Sunday, Dec. 23, by the Bishop of Rochester; on Dec. 21 by the Bishop of Oxford, Bath and Wells, Norwich, Bangor, and Worcester.



The new church of St. Thomas, in the parish of Preston, on Thursday week, consecrated by the Bishop of Manchester. The building stands on a piot of land given by Mr. Alexander Hesketh, of Preston. It is erected in the Early Decorated Gothic style of architecture, has cost £2600, and will afford accommodation for 600 persons, 400 of the seats being free. of the church. The Rev. Canon Turner, Vicar of Lancaster, has provided the endowment of £150 a year, and has undertaken the duties of incumbent and vicar, which is of silver; and Mr. Rawcliffe, one merchant, of Preston, has purchased a new organ for the church.

Yesterday week the new Church of St. Michael and All Angels, in the parish of Bromley, was consecrated. It is built and was laid by the Countess of Ellesmere, on the 29th of September last, was consecrated by the Bishop of Rochester. The district assigned to the church is in the immediate neighbourhood of the East India Docks and great ship-building yards of Messrs. Wigram and Green, and contains a population of 5000 principally employed in those establishments. Mr. Alexander Hesketh, of the parish of Bromley, the population of which increased from 11,000 in 1851 to 17,000 in 1861. All the sittings are declared free.

The new Church of All Saints, Surrey-square, Kent-road, was consecrated by the Bishop of London, on Monday. The site, value £2000, together with the church, cost £4000, was presented by Mr. Peek, M.P., and he made a further subscription of £1000 towards the building fund. The total cost of the church was £4750 has been paid. It is situated in a new district of 11,000. It was laid by the Duchess of St. Albans, in 1859. It is in the Decorated style of Gothic architecture, and has been erected by Mr. Ferrey, from the designs of Mr. Alexander Peek, the founder's brother. The sitting accommodation is for 800, and all the seats are free. The Rev. Thomas Peek, M.A., late Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and formerly has been Curate at St. Peter's, Walworth, has been presented to the living.

The Rev. J. Ellacombe, Rector of Clyst St. George, Devon-square, has twenty-nine, in a letter to the Guardian, the position which he and others have taken in the matter of the Burial Service, and the conduct of ceremonies and observances which have lately been discussed in the House of Lords:—"I am not aware that anything has been done in the Church these things (lights, incense, and vestments) to be lawful, and we know them to be part of the ritual of the Church of England, and that we are invited to continue their use until it is shown that we are wrong in doing so; only by the authority of the Church can they be taken away. It is the duty of the Bishop to use rule. No disrespect to the office of Bishop; only—Bishops are not infallible, nor Archbishops."

The following appointments and preferments have recently been made:—Rev. Edward Bickersteth, Rector of Watton, Herts, to be Dean; Rev. R. A. Walker to be Vicar of Tower Gorting, Worcestershire. Incumbencies: Rev. J. Wilson, Bath, to Bath Abbey; Rev. J. Bowstead, Bath, to Kilmersdon; Rev. J. Kitchener to Ridge, Salop; Rev. G. H. Parker (St. Augustine's, Canterbury) to Ashford, Middlesex; Rev. Thomas Hill, D.D., Bath, to St. Andrew's, Lambeth; Surrey. Curacies: Rev. S. H. Bennett to Bow, Hill

INSPECTION OF VOLUNTEERS AT CHRISTCHURCH, CANTERBURY, NEW ZEALAND.

VOLUNTEER ENCAMPMENT AND INSPECTION AT CHRISTCHURCH, NEW ZEALAND.

THE volunteer corps of Christchurch, Lyttelton, and Kaiapoi, in the province of Canterbury, New Zealand, assembled, on Saturday, April 15, at Hillsborough, a few miles from the town of Christchurch, and encamped there for three days. There is a rifle range at this place, which is easily accessible by the new railway from Christchurch; and the railway contractors, Messrs. George Holmes and Co., had liberally given their utmost assistance to the volunteer movement, not only by running special trains but also by granting the use of the land required. The total muster of all the corps was 315, which is about half the number of volunteers enrolled in the province of Canterbury. They were under the general command of Major White. Fifty of them consisted of well-mounted cavalry, under the command of Captain Reader. Captain Armstrong was Adjutant; Captain M.W. Anderson was Aide-de-Camp, and Lieutenant Hilton was acting Quartermaster. The men were comfortably lodged in tents, and had their meals in a large wooden shed built for the purpose. On the Sunday Divine service was performed by the Bishop of Christchurch. On the Monday a rifle-shooting match took place for a cup, value £20, given by Mr. Beasley, the superintendent of the province, as a challenge prize to be competed for by the chosen marksmen of seven different companies of the volunteers—three members of each company being allowed to shoot. It was won by the No. 1 company; and Lieutenant Cook, of that company, also won the prize of £10 for the highest individual score. In the afternoon of the same day the whole force was inspected by the commanding officer, as shown in our Illustration, going through various evolutions and manœuvres in a very creditable style. The artillery consisted of one 9-pounder, lent by H.M.S. Mermaid. A large number of spectators from Christchurch witnessed these proceedings, which were followed, next day, by further shooting-matches, cavalry races, and other sports; while the music of three military bands contributed to enliven the scene.

HART ISLAND, NEAR NEW YORK.

AMONG the signs of returning peace most satisfactory to the observer of affairs in America during the last two or three months was the disbandment, or, as it is there termed, the "mustering out," of the various regiments composing the armies of the United States. One of the stations appointed for this purpose was at Hart Island, situated at the head of Long Island Sound, about twenty miles from the city of New York. Since the early days of the war Hart Island had been used as a general depôt for recruits, a purpose for which it was admirably adapted by its healthful situation. Our Correspondent visited the place some weeks ago, on the invitation of Captain Barstow, Aide-de-Camp of General Dix's Staff, who was the officer in charge of the arrangements for mustering-out troops at this post, and had a fast-going steamer at his command. The sketch of Hart Island which we have engraved was taken from David's Island, which lies at a short distance from it, and is also a depôt for troops.

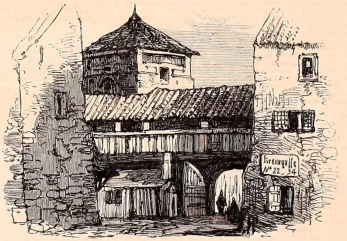
MUNICH.



Munich, called by its citizens the German Athens, disputes with Edinburgh the claim to be the modern representative of that classic city. The pedigree of its northern rival is the longer, and the outward features are more like the original; but Munich, by the rich abundance of its art-treasures and the unrivalled taste and sumptuousness of its architecture, seems to have inherited at least as much of the spirit that made Athens what it was. Many points of resemblance may be found in the present condition of Munich and Edinburgh. Each consists of an old and a new town: the one quaint, picturesque, and full of the memorials of a bygone age; the other refined, magnificent, and displaying a revival of all that is beautiful in art. The older part of Munich, from which most of our present Engravings are taken, is small in comparison with the vast space which has been marked out for the city. It is situated on the left bank "of Isar rolling rapidly," and is so called either because, in A.D. 962, it was founded upon the ruins of a monastery, or for some other reason connected with monks, as its name implies. The representation of a monk, indeed, is still used in the arms of the city. Unlike many of its neighbours, its streets are broad and tolerably regular, and interspersed with large squares, surrounded by richly-decorated houses, beneath which run arcades or colonnades, as in Covent Garden Piazza. The projecting corner towers, often very highly ornamented, add much to the beauty of the free old mansions, which are so numerous in Munich. Indeed, so striking was the appearance of the city about two centuries ago, that when, in 1632, during the Thirty Years' War, the heroic Gustavus Adolphus had captured it, he forbad any portion of it to be injured, saying that it deserved to stand to all time. Regalis sane sententia! He was not so forbearing, however, in his wishes as in his actions, for when he entered the Elector's Palace, which still stands, on the east side of the Residenz Strasse, he was so struck with the splendour of the great hall that he professed himself sorry he could not convey it to Stockholm. Had he lived in our days he might have engaged the services of the enterprising American who is said to have been within an ace of buying and carrying off by piecemeal the House of William Shakespeare and putting it up again in a New York Museum. Alas for Gustavus Adolphus! Had he gained his wish, he never would have eaten dinner in that hall. A few months later saw him shot by open foe, or, quite as likely, by treacherous friend, upon the fatal field of Lutzen. There used to be preserved in a room of this old palace a "correct likeness" of one Christopher Feschammer, a notorious assassin. His bump of destructiveness was so preternaturally developed, and the Bavarian hump of caution so hopelessly depressed, that he is said to have committed 345 murders with his own hand, and to have been an accomplice in 400 more. The good creature who complained that the newspapers were so dull because there were "never any murders now" should have lived in a quiet street of Munich these days. In one of the streets of this palace is mark in the wall is preserved, 12 ft. from the ground, which a very athletic Bavarian Prince, called Christopher the Leaper, is reported to have reached with his heels, at one jump. Though this palace is of great size, the late King Ludwig, to whom it belonged, was so extremely munificence Munich is almost wholly indebted for its present attractiveness and its immense wings, so that the present and new buildings now form a pile worthy of the Sovereign of a greater kingdom than Bavaria. The southern wing was built by his predecessor, the King Ludwig, with the choicest frescoes and with all that money and art could accomplish, is used as the residence of the Royal family. As Bavaria did not join the coalition against France, Napoleon, in 1805, allowed the then Duke or Elector, Maximilian Joseph, to assume the title of King. Maximilian, dying in 1825, was succeeded by his son Ludwig I., to whose love of art Munich owes so much. Ludwig was compelled, during the troubles of 1848, to abdicate in favour of his son Maximilian Joseph II., who died in 1864. The throne and the Kingdom are now occupied by Maximilian's eldest son, Otho, whom the late King of Greece, who, in October, 1862, was deprived of the kingdom intended for him by the Powers, used to call his son, as a son of Ludwig I. The northern wing of the palace, or the Festbau, intended chiefly for state receptions, is not yet finished or even embellished than the Königsbau. The Chapel Royal, called the Schöne or Reiche Kapelle, is adorned with the costliest materials. In the main block of buildings, and on the line of the old palace, stands All Saints' Chapel, one of the earliest fruits of King Ludwig's enthusiasm for the Middle Ages, which, though not lovely, and would strike consternation into the hearts of those who object to decorations in churches. Here every Bavarian is buried, and that, too, in so profuse a manner that the eye looks in vain for the cold walls and wholesome connected in our minds with the idea of a church or chapel. Here it not that a still finer interior is to be seen in the new Church of St. Boniface, to which, as it is the newest and our attention, we might linger here for hours, and wander from one red marble column to another, gazing at the glorious frescoes that tell in successive order the whole religious history of mankind.

Leaving this, and passing through the palace gardens, we come to the English Park, and feel ourselves almost at home in it, only, which, however, owes its origin to the celebrated Count Rumford. This singular man, originally plain Benjamin Thompson, was born in Woburn, Massachusetts. After turning his hand to a variety of pursuits, he raised a regiment of Dragoons in 1781 for King George III., and was rewarded with a commendation." Washington's star being in the ascendant, he came to England in 1784, and was knighted for his services. He then took him at Munich, where he was made a Lieutenant-General, and received the title of Count Rumford. After returning to England and his bagnashing himself, as he had done already, to his scientific researches, he finally went to Paris, where this true cosmopolite died, in 1802. He deservedly has a monument in the English Park, and a bust, which with its cool shades, pleasant nooks, and not unpleasant Bacchic Bier, affords the merriest alike to the eye wearied with too much art, and to the wants of the thirsty soul.

Standing at the Sieges Thor, or Arch of Triumph, a noble structure, one may gaze along the broad Ludwigstrasse, the Via Sacra of Munich, and see on each side the evidences of what King Ludwig has done for art. If, returning to the old city, we could look down from the dome-capped towers of the cathedral, we should see the Royal Residence and several walls, abundant proofs of as grand a design for an imperial capital as ever entered the mind of Augustus or Constantine. It is this breadth of design which renders Munich somewhat disappointing at first, as it gives the idea that it is thinly inhabited. Whatever else they may have, good taste has not yet been struck by the Munich people. Of this it must be confessed, is still a city of good intentions. Taking the old town as the nucleus, Ludwig has thrown out, with princely munificence on every side the broadest streets, broken here and there with spacious squares, and along the whole of these lines, with palaces, churches, and public and private buildings, and finally passing through triumphal arches to the parks and lawns open to the open country, dream, worthy of the poet-king, for Ludwig was a poet; but it was a dream which required for its realisation the revenues of not such monarchies as Bavaria or the purse of Fortunatus. In his youth he had been an enthusiastic lover of poetry, music, painting, and sculpture. He had inherited the tastes, before the mania, of his father, and of his accomplished father, Maximilian I., and had devoted immense sums to the purchase of the most valuable pictures, statues, and other works of art. He had travelled extensively, and noted down for future guidance into whatever was most attractive in the countries of Italy and other countries. The accounts for the fact that most of the modern buildings erected in the city are more remarkable rather than original designs. He was the companion rather than the patron of men of genius, and assembled around his throne at one time what had fixed a Medicis a whole army of artists of every kind. On the errors which cost Ludwig his crown and for a while exposed him to the reprobation of all right-minded men and of the Pope, on religious subjects, are half-forgotten now, and will not be remembered by posterity, who will judge him by what he has done for architecture and art. The Glyptothek, as by an affected classicism, the German call a sculpture-gallery, was begun by his father, Maximilian I., who, as before said, by favour of Napoleon, changed his electorate into a kingdom in 1806. The works of art already there were added to by Ludwig, when Crown Prince, at his own expense, and comprise specimens of the choicest sculpture from the solemn old-world Egyptian colossi to the lifelike grace of Thorwaldsen and Canova. The Pinakotheke, or picture-galleries, which stand in a part of the great square, are to be, have a world-wide reputation, and this is both built by Ludwig. The older gallery, the Pinakothek par excellence, contains an immense quantity of the works of the old masters. Any attempt to enumerate the treasures of art which have been here accumulated would be absurd. It is the great lion of Munich, and attracts the pilgrimage of tourists, artists, and dilettanti from all parts of the world. If King Ludwig could have done this alone, he would have reared a monument more enduring than brass, for canvas is perishable even though nature cleaners should be merciful, yet this will continue to be a source of his fame and munificence for generations to come.

Not far from the Pinakothek is the Basilica of St. Boniface, begun in 1850, in honour of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the King's marriage, and not completed until after the close of his reign. The exterior is of red brick, which is hot as the interior is cool, and presents a glorious within with a thousand rainbow hues. It would require the pen of Ruskin to give an adequate conception of the richness and the marvellous loveliness of the interior. The nave and two side aisles, of which the church consists, are supported on white marble columns, and these marble pillars ranged in four rows; the floor is of marble mosaic; the side walls are covered with encaustics in imitation of the most rich and rare variegated marbles; the roof is of open woodwork, with carved beams painted and gilded, and panels of the same. Above all, at the east the walls are covered with the most exquisite frescoes in two series—the upper representing scenes in the lives of the German saints; the lower devoted to the life and labours of St. Boniface, to whom Bavaria is indebted for its conversion to Christianity, in the eighth century. It is with no little interest, independently of their artistic merits, that an Englishman looks upon these frescoes, for St. Boniface was born in Devonshire, and was employed to preach the good old Saxon name of Winifred. He was influenced by an ardent desire to convert the idolatrous Germans. One of the frescoes represents the trenchant manner in which he dealt with them. At Geismar, in Hesse, there was a tree, sacred to the god Thor, which the Germans held in the greatest veneration. It is said that St. Boniface, in presence of the heathen, boldly cut it down, and that, as Thor did not resist the indignity, the multitude began to distrust his power, and, by the energy and preaching of St. Boniface, were converted to Christianity. This mode of proceeding appears to have answered very well in the eighth century. The history of St. Boniface is in its main points, no doubt authentic, and as a true martyr of the faith he is well enshrined in the magnificent offering of the Basilica in the Karlsstrasse.

The cathedral, usually a central point of attraction, is eclipsed by the splendours of the modern churches, and possesses fewer merits than might be expected in a city so rich as Munich is in all that can satisfy the most exacting taste. It is, however, rich in its ancient stained-glass windows, though even these are nowadays yielding to the modern glass for which Munich enjoys so high a reputation.

Few things seem to have been neglected in this city. It abounds not only in museums—indeed, it has itself been called one vast museum of art—but it is well provided with asylums for the relief of every kind of distress. Even the blind, it has a prince, the reigning prince particularly wise. Every prisoner is taught some trade, or made to work at that which he has previously exercised in his home. A fund is raised, and, after allowing a certain sum for the expense of his maintenance and a deduction for the prison, the surplus, though small, is allowed to accumulate for his own benefit. The accumulation, however, is not to be given to the prisoner, but allowed to accumulate his surplus earnings for twenty-two years, and to have been presented with it retiring from his imprisonment, with the handsome capital sum of about £6 sterling. But a little Bavarian money goes a great way, and is worth pounds into Sovereigns. Indeed, this is the only explanation of the marvellous results accomplished in Munich with the resources of a second or third rate Power. To look down the Ludwigstrasse and see the costly edifices there—the Hall of the Marshals, the Library, with its books and manuscripts of priceless value, the Library, the Academies, the Geographical, the War Office, the Georgianum or University, and the Triumphal Arch; or to look to other parts of the city and see the splendid and almost such buildings as the Glyptothek and Pinakotheke, containing treasures worth a King's ransom, one cannot but marvel at the wonderful economy of comparatively small resources which has produced such results. England has its so-called Gallery in Trafalgar-square, which is a disgrace, with a revenue not one tenth of our own, can afford the most commodious, well-arranged, and perfect galleries in Europe. It is with a proper nationality that Bavarians who have raised themselves above their fellows in arts and trade, like Reindel, the painter, in Rome, Ett, high, of Munich, offering to her people, in the one hand the sword to protect, in the other the crown to reward, the highest virtue, is a true type of the spirit that pervades both monarch and people. It is startling, however, to think, as one looks at it, that the present monarch has only reigned and down a staircase inside the statue as they do, and that possibly some six or eight Germans are discussing the Schleswig-Holstein question within the head of the beautiful female figure by which Schwanthaler has expressed his idea of the patron-genius of Bavaria.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1865.

"THERE goes reason to roasting of eggs," says the very old proverb, implying that even the simplest affair of life demands a certain amount of common-sense. What are we to think, then, of men who have before them the most important and elaborate problem which can occupy the mind of statesman, and who apparently begin by withdrawing common-sense from among the aids to the solution? We allude, as will probably be guessed, to those of the American politicians who, having to reconstruct the South, propose to give the suffrage to the unprepared black population. It is difficult to deal gravely with the idea; but, nevertheless, a powerful party exists it into a principle, and threatens loudly in its defence.

In accordance with the general practice custom when a European opinion is advanced on a question affecting the Americans, they may begin by apprising us that the business is not ours, and that, inasmuch as they have carried on a war without our interference, they may be supposed equally capable of adjusting the administrative difficulties arising out of that war. Both propositions we must take the great liberty of disputing. The question is a great if only as a question of humanity. With the territorial arrangements of the Americans, so long as our colonies are unassailed, we admit that we have not much concern. Whether the States consist of one mighty and glorious republic, which holds together the most opposite peoples by force of a sentiment rather than by any natural or very reasonable union, or whether they fall into two or three divisions, in accordance with what would seem to be the dictate of instinct, are not circumstances materially affecting Europe. It is to our interest that America should be prosperous and peaceful; and whatever arrangements may most conduce to render her so must be fervently regarded by us. It is with her internal condition that we are concerned; and, looking at the subject from a commercial point of view, and borrowing an illustration from commerce, we contend that we have a right to be heard. We are doing much business with her, we hope to do more, with the great house of Liberty, Johnson, and Co. If that house chooses to carry on its business in what we think an inexpedient fashion, and to bring under one roof a miscellaneous assemblage of "stores" which might be better managed apart, we have no title to complain. But, as we are very much interested in the success of the great house, and as we desire to do a good deal with one especial department, we are surely justified in protesting, when we go in to attend to our own affairs with it, if, instead of meeting with liberal managers and gentlemanly clerks, we are handed over to a body of Ethiopian serenaders, who sit on the counters, neglect the packages, and sing black dirges during business hours. This is the sort of thing with which we are now menaced, and we therefore crave leave to say that customers ought to be considered. The fact that the American method of adjusting administrative difficulties as of fighting gallant battles is by no means made clear to us by the other fact that a large number of persons in the States are favourably inclined towards the Black Republic. Now, we really cannot go into first principles every time that we have to discuss important details. Such a process is dear to the nature of vestrymen and the like, to juvenile debaters in societies, and to that large class of individuals who, in private life, are known and avoided as bores. We have often said, and we beg to refer to our recorded sentiments, that we detest slavery; and, though we wish that the American slaves had been freed gradually and peacefully, instead of by a hideous war, we rejoice that slavery has been done away. But we do not mean to be always saying this. It is with Sambo the American citizen, and not Sambo the oppressed negro, that we have now to deal; and we conceive that it is most courteous to that interesting person himself to treat him in his new capacity, and only to glance at his unfortunate antecedents when his ambition, or that of his absurd friends, forces them upon our recollection. We heartily congratulate him on his freedom, and, that being said, we must use a little freedom of our own.

The Abolitionists, or the least moderate and sensible among them, are displaying the bigotry of men with one idea, and they refuse to listen to the councils of men who have several ideas, and who will not tolerate slavery of the mind. Having fought out the battle, and having stricken away the negro's fetters, these pseudo-friends of his insist that, in spite of the cramping process which he has undergone from childhood, he is a mental athlete, and suddenly capable of all the work for which others have had to be trained. Sambo, whose highest aim had been the avoidance of more work than he could help, and to whose chief happiness had been in fantastic dances and idiotic songs, or, when he took to religion, in the lowest form of devotional sentimentality, is now to be an elector, to weigh the merits of statesmen, and to come dancing up to the ballot-box with an inordinate development of shirt-collar in honour of the nation, and to record his choice between Massa Chase and Massa Seward, should those gentlemen be the candidates. That such an idea should be seriously entertained is almost incredible, but we wish that it were only funny. Were the election one of a municipal councillor or a beadle, it would be highly comic to see a sable gubbins tradesman or a pompous humble soliciting the support of a black patron and being answered with the ineffable air of superiority which Sambo can put on; but the choice is to be of men who govern one mighty empire, and hold relations with the world.

England has been so truly and zealously "anti-slavery" that she can afford to speak out in this matter. It is a mockery to place the franchise in the hands of the blacks in their present condition, as a mass. The coloured man is a child, or, at most, a few hundred, who are educated, is nothing in the argument, save that it is the invaluable exception. To return to our eggs. Change a man with selling you a dozen bad, and he exhibits at single fresh specimens, and you can appreciate is proved. So with the negroes. Those who pedantically contend for their enfranchisement, for the sake of a sham consistency, know perfectly well that they are not to be trusted with the most ordinary business transaction; and to put the whole population that the choice of political representatives is to be given. The shout of laughter with which the idea has been received has only to be echoed again and again, and the worst portions of the question make it too important for mere laughter. We appeal to the sanity of America against its bigotry.

THE COURT.

ON Thursday week the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, drove in the grounds adjacent to Osborne. Princess Louisa, attended by the Hon. Elizabeth Harcourt, rode out. Prince Arthur, attended by Colonel the Hon. Sir C. B. Phipps and Major Elphinstone, arrived at Cowes in the Royal Yacht Victoria and Albert from Ballater. The Royal Highness proceeded immediately to Osborne.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by Prince Arthur, drove in the vicinity of the Royal demesne. Princess Helena and Princess Louisa walked and drove in the neighbourhood of Osborne.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by Prince Arthur and Princess Beatrice, drove in the grounds of Osborne. Later in the day her Majesty, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, took a carriage-drive. Princess Helena and Princess Louisa, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, drove. Her Majesty held a Council, and gave an audience of her Majesty.

On Sunday the Queen, Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, and Prince Arthur attended Divine service, performed at Osborne by the Rev. W. L. Ostheim, Chaplain to her Majesty in Germany. Princess Beatrice attended Divine service at Whippingham Church. This was the twenty-first anniversary of the birthday of Prince Alfred. Salutes were fired in honour of the event from the battery in Portsmouth Harbour and from the ships of war lying at Spithead.

On Monday the Queen held a Council, which was attended by the Lord Chancellor, Earl Granville, Viscount Palmerston, and the Right Hon. T. M. Gibson. At the Council the meeting of the new Parliament (the writs of which were returned on Tuesday, the 15th inst.) was prorogued to Thursday, the 1st of November next. At the meeting of the House of Convocation was, at the same time, prorogued to Thursday, the 2nd day of November next. An Order in Council, at the Council. Earl Granville had an audience of the Queen. Subsequently her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena, walked and drove in the grounds of Osborne. Princess Louisa walked out.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Major-General Lascelles to be one of her Majesty's maids of honour in ordinary, in the room of the Hon. Emma Elizabeth Lascelles, resigned.

DEPARTURE OF THE QUEEN FOR GERMANY.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Princess Beatrice, Prince Arthur, and Prince Leopold, left Osborne on half-past one o'clock on Tuesday, on route for Germany. The suite in attendance consisted of the Duchess of Roxburghe, Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey, Major-General Sir T. M. Biddulph, Dr. Jenner, and Mr. Duff. Her Majesty travelled incognito. Her Majesty as Minister in attendance. The Queen embarked at Osborne on board the Royal Yacht Alberta, and was towed by the Gospoort. Her Majesty was received upon landing by Admiral Sir Michael Seymour, Port-Admiral Lord F. Churchill, and the officers. The Queen travelled in a state saloon by a special train furnished by the South-Western Railway Company. The train left Gosport at a quarter to two o'clock, and reached the Waterloo station at four. Her Majesty was received by several of the directors of the South-Eastern Railway Company, and by Mr. Cooper, the superintendent; Knight, superintendent; and Mr. Ashcroft, Captain Maginlos, chairman of the London and South-Western; and Mr. Glyn, chairman of the South-Eastern, Companies were also present. The engine having been changed for one belonging to the South-Western Company, the train proceeded on its course to Farnstead. The train was here shunted into the siding, which runs from the main line through the gateway at the eastern boundary of Woolwich Arsenal, and through the grounds of the Arsenal to the pier which is close to the head of the pier. This siding, which consists of a single line, has not previously been used for the transit of the Queen. The train arrived at the head of the Arsenal Pier at five minutes past four. The Queen having travelled from Gosport, without change of carriage, in four hours and seven minutes. The Queen was received on the pier by Colonel Boxer, Colonel Campbell, Colonel Clerk, and Captain Gordon, C.B., at the heads of the several departments of the Arsenal; by Major-General Wardle, C.B., Commodore Dunlop, C.B., and various other officers connected with the station. Her Majesty was received on the Queen's reception were, in accordance with her Majesty's wish, of the simplest kind. There was no guard of honour and no salutes were fired. The gateway through which the Queen passed was decorated with evergreens, an awning was spread over the whole length of the pier, and the pathway laid with crimson cloth, and flags floated from every available point. On each side of the pier a space was railed off, and seats provided for those to whom permission to visit the Arsenal had been issued. A large concourse of spectators assembled in the streets from whom burst an enthusiastic cheer as the Queen walked upon the pier leading by the hand Princess Beatrice. During the Queen's progress down the pier the spectators silently greeted her Majesty. The Queen repeatedly bowed in acknowledgment of the respectful salutations of those assembled. Prince Arthur accompanied the Royal family on board the Alberta, and after a few minutes returned ashore, attended by Lord Alfred Paget and Viscount Sydney, and proceeded by train to Greenwich Park. In a quarter of an hour after the embarkation the Royal yacht steamed down the river to Lea Reach amid the numerous yachts and boats filled with spectators. The Royal standard and yacht Ensign had colours flying from every spar. At Greenhithe the Royal squadron joined the Alberta and proceeded on board the Victoria and Albert. Prince Leopold, Lord Clarence Paget, Lord Frederick Kerr, and Mr. Previously embarked in the Royal yacht. The Victoria and Albert remained at anchor during the night, and at daybreak started for Antwerp, where her Majesty arrived at seven o'clock on Wednesday morning. The Alberta and the squadron of Royal yachts followed by the English residents and a considerable number of the inhabitants of Antwerp, who had assembled on the quay. Her Majesty proceeded to the railway terminus, and left by train for Germany.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

On Sunday the Prince and Princess of Wales attended Divine service at Whippingham Church.

On Monday the Prince and Princess, attended by the Hon. Mrs. Hardinge and Major Teesdale, left Osborne Cottage for Marlborough House. Their Royal Highnesses embarked at Osborne in a small yacht and were received on board the Alberta by Colonel the Hon. Sir Charles Beaumont Phipps, Receiver-General, Lieutenant-General Bowles, Equerry in Waiting, Household and Royal Physicians; and Mr. Herbert Fisher, Keeper of the Privy Seal. Mr. Bateman, the secretary, attended on board the Victoria and Albert. The Lords Lascelles visited the Prince and Princess. On Wednesday week a banquet was given in Londonderry to Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B., late Commissioner of Police, on receiving the freedom of the city. The banquet, and its presence was hailed by his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the Marquis of Hertford. A ball was given in the evening. The entertainments were good, the prospect fine, and the wealth, which was received with rapturous applause.

A young man who was employed as temporary messenger of the Bank of England, and who was charged with the wilful destruction or destroying 99 letters intrusted to him for delivery. Among some letters found in his possession was one addressed to a gentleman in Paris, in which he stated that he had destroyed the letters because he had seen in them three or six letters into the fire, and, when remonstrated with, he said, "Oh, it's nothing: I made away with fifty this week."

The returns up to the 1st of August show the attendance of 50,000 to the world's fair" at Dublin. The building, its contents, and gardens are now not only completed, but are seen in all their freshness and beauty. Daily the visitors are treated with musical entertainments of the highest order, including the bands of the different regiments stationed in the metropolis. Each night there is also some of the most splendid displays of the day, from the cathedrals at home and on the Continent. The grounds attached to the Exhibition are beautifully illuminated with variegated lamps and candles. The collection of modern sculpture has been further enriched within the last week, by the addition of many very attractive works.

The annual meeting of the Sussex Archæological Society, which will take place, next Thursday, within the ruined walls of Amberley Castle, near Arundel, promises to be an interesting occasion. The Bishop of Chichester, to whom Amberley Castle belongs, will preside; and the Vicar, the Rev. C. A. Clarkson, will read an historical memoir of the place. We shall probably give an illustration.

By a recent Act of Parliament the office of Recorder of Falmouth is abolished, and the borough gost is to be discontinued. All the prisoners are to be removed to Cornwall County Prison. The Recorder is to receive his salary for life, or until he accepts another appointment. The Act is to take effect on the 1st of January, 1866. There is to be no Recorder's Court for the borough, and Falmouth gost is to rest in the clerk of the peace of Cornwall, and may be used by the justices in a "lock-up house."

A meeting was held at the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce office, yesterday week, to consider the advisability of making a road for the widow and family of the late Admiral Fitzroy. Mr. Ferguson described the Fitzroy monument, which is to be placed on the highest ten yards in Britain, near pre-nists and left his family £5000 in debt. Government had promised to liquidate £2000 of this amount, and a subscription on the previous day made up subscriptions for the benefit of the widow and family of the late Admiral.

A fatal casualty was reported on Monday, at a meeting of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, and delivered a speech on the patent laws. He explained the difficulties in the way of their improvement and their success, and said that, though the question was not ripe for any such decisive measure as a proposal to abolish them, he thought that they ought to be subjected to the consideration of a Committee of the House of Commons, or of a commission partly practical and partly scientific.

At a recent public meeting at Malton, held with a view to the suggestion that a memory of the late Sir Robert Carlisle, it was resolved that a handsome erection shall be placed on the highest point of the Castle Howard estate, about six miles from Malton. The monument, a commanding eminence has been formed for carrying out the object, and a deputation has been appointed to wait on the noblemen and gentlemen of Leeds and the West Riding, with a view to form a committee to co-operate with the Malton one. or, if it be deemed advisable, to take the management of the matter.

A breakwater is being erected at the entrance to the pictoresque at Port Erin, in the Isle of Man, which will cost about £40,000. A few days ago it became necessary to clear away by blasting an immense mass of rocks. For this purpose a considerable quantity (each about 10 lb. gun, were drilled into the rock, and in each chamber was deposited 10 lb. of gunpowder. The chambers were connected with a fuse to the burn. In a short time after the fuse the chambers exploded with a dull heavy boom, and after a brief pause the rocks were rent asunder, and fell with a thundering crash, and the rock was severed from its connection with the mountain.

Severe thunderstorms passed over the North and East Ridings on Sunday night and Monday afternoon, with torrents of rain. The storms were also accompanied by severe thunderstorms, which have unquestionably done in some places. The main centre of the storms are marked by hail ours, but the hail-stones were of unusual size. At Bridlington Quay the hail fell to the depth of four inches in places. Many of the fowls were killed by the rain. The lightning are trivial.—Mr. Tomkins, writing from Ashington, in Suffolk, says that, yesterday week, in the neighbourhood of Framlingham (which mention has been made by the astronomer Royal and others) began, his farm was visited with a storm more than ten (10) inches in depth for sixty acres. About ten acres of land were covered with hail, and, strange to say, the storm did not extend in width half a mile on each side of the farm.

The annual distribution of prizes provided by the iron and coal masters of Monmouthshire for the encouragement of education took place last week. The Bishop of the diocese presided, whilst the prizes were distributed by Lord Abergavenny, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Newport. From the report of the examiners we should infer that elementary education is in a satisfactory state in this county. There were 1,500 candidates competing; out of this number 104 failed entirely. Sixty-four £10 prizes were distributed, and 100 £5 prizes. The examiners also report that the most efficient schools in religious knowledge, and 220 certificates were also distributed. All the schools in the county, irrespective of creed, were admitted to the competition. It was observed by one of the examiners that "the spirit of healthy emulation, and the desire to excel, was manifested, favorable in consequence of the pressure upon the "three R's" by the revised code.

The Archbishop of York presided, on Wednesday, at the annual distribution of prizes to the competitive examinations in the deanery of Wigton, in the diocese of Carlisle. These examinations were instituted by the Rev. J. C. Miller, Rector of Bromfield, and Rural Dean of Calder, Cumberland, for the encouragement of the state of education in the district, of which he is a native. The prizes given by Mr. Moore number about 200, and consist of books, Bibles, and other articles suitable as rewards and prizes for the girls, some of whose prizes are for useful needlework, including knitting and darning. The Rural Dean has a large and laborious district, and in a marquee erected in a field near Wigton, the presence of a large number of ladies sitting among the boys and girls, the Rev. J. C. Miller, the Rural Dean, bishop of York were the Lord Mayor of London, the Bishop of Carlisle, Mr. Moore, and many other gentlemen.

The Herbert Memorial Committee, after long and repeated examinations of designs, have been requested to have remodelled or had suggested themselves as likely to be suitable for the sites of convalescent home, five at Salisbury purchased at the suggestion of Sidmouth, a design in the old cliff facing south, at a short distance from the town. An elaborate plan prepared two years ago by Mr. Scott, and which was to be carried out under the civil terms of the Crown employed at the War Office, has been put into the hands of Mr. Scott, who is to be requested to have it remodelled to meet the views of the British estimates and begin the building during the ensuing autumn. It is stated that the expenses of the Herbert Memorial Hospital alone" to be from £40,000 to £50,000, and that £20,000 of this amount has both are to be under one trust—namely, a Royal charter—each will be independent of the other. The Committee report that, with the exception of subscriptions paid or promised, after the payment of £2000 to Baron Marochetti for the statue of Salisbury, and £191 for expenses, is £6,000.

"GLORIMS IN SIGHT OF ROME."

THE subject of the admirable picture by Mr. Lehmann, which we have engraved from the last Exhibition of the Royal Academy, is a group of pilgrims on the Campagna, and also with some of the sight-seers who have visited or received part of their artistic education at Rome. One of the most distinguished of the pupils whom the President of our Royal Academy, Sir Charles Eastlake, was in subject similar to this. And he must be bigoted indeed who does not feel a sympathies charm in the picturesque and patient devotion of those played by the poor peasant pilgrims from all parts of Italy, and even from elsewhere, who may be encountered along the dusty roads towards Rome, especially on the approach of Holy Week, in order to visit the holy places and to gain the plenary indulgences, remissions, and indulgences.

The great advantage, in the eyes of pilgrims, of a visit to Rome in Holy Week is the receiving the benediction pronounced by the Pope, from the balcony of St. Peter's, on the ascending occasion of the Easter mass beneath, which ceremony takes place on Holy Thursday and Easter Sunday. On these occasions, also, the prayer containing the bull of plenary indulgence are thrown among the people, in Holy Week, too, the Church of Santa Scala, near to the Lateran, and St. Peter's give absolution for mortal sins which cannot otherwise be absolved. A city containing the tomb of St. Peter, and other holy places and relics, must necessarily attract visitors to be beheld, naturally requires for the poor Roman Catholic pilgrims a character as sacred as the Ten Commandments; and hence, indeed, when the city is first descried across the great plain of the Campagna, which surrounds it, the pilgrims usually prostrates in adoration. In this picture we see an aged couple whose pilgrimage on foot from the Alps has evidently been long enabled, kneeling, repeated in prayer, where they have caught the first glimpse of the mighty dome of St. Peter's—the object of their journey—and that of the Eternal City, and which almost alone would be visible above the gathering mists and heat-haze. The aged man, represented, indeed, of the dangerous malaria which rises towards sundown, the woman has put off her goatskin sandals, and kneels, telling her beads, while the man has thrown himself on the prostrate attitude of the innumerable remains of old Rome which still strew the desolate Campagna. Accompanying them, and probably pursuing the same direction as the pilgrims, are a beautiful young woman, the daughter, perhaps, of the aged pilgrims; or this may be the wife of the man who is kneeling, and one of the sons of this districts about Rome, only for a "cicciara," or woman from the mountains, who has been engaged to attend upon the aged by the pilgrims. Her swathed bambino lies in the basket-cradle which these women carry along behind them with a staff, and from its hands dangles a sequin, hung there to amuse the child.

In the evenings of Holy Week the visitor to Rome may witness at the Hospital of the Trinità de' Pellegrini the curious ceremony of the washing of the feet of the pilgrims who have journeyed to Rome for the Holy Week by the great dignitaries and nobles of Rome, who also attend on them, like servants, at their meals afterwards in the same hospital, which is open for rest. The ceremony is of course in communion of Christ's washing the feet of his disciples. The different sexes are placed in separate departments of the hospital, and the process regularly engaged for these charitable offices are enrolled in confraternities and sisterhoods, numbering many of the first persons in the aristocracy of Rome. His Holiness is enrolled in the association, as are about twenty-seven cardinals. Several kings have been so likewise; and, up to the year 1847, the associated sisterhood was presided over by the Princess Rospigliosi. To be entitled to admission, the pilgrims must have come from a distance of more than sixty miles. At Easter, Italian pilgrims are entertained for three days, Ultramontanes for four, and Portuguese for seven; and at other times for shorter periods. On their departure those who have come from beyond Italy receive a Roman sequin, and Bohemians a scudo.

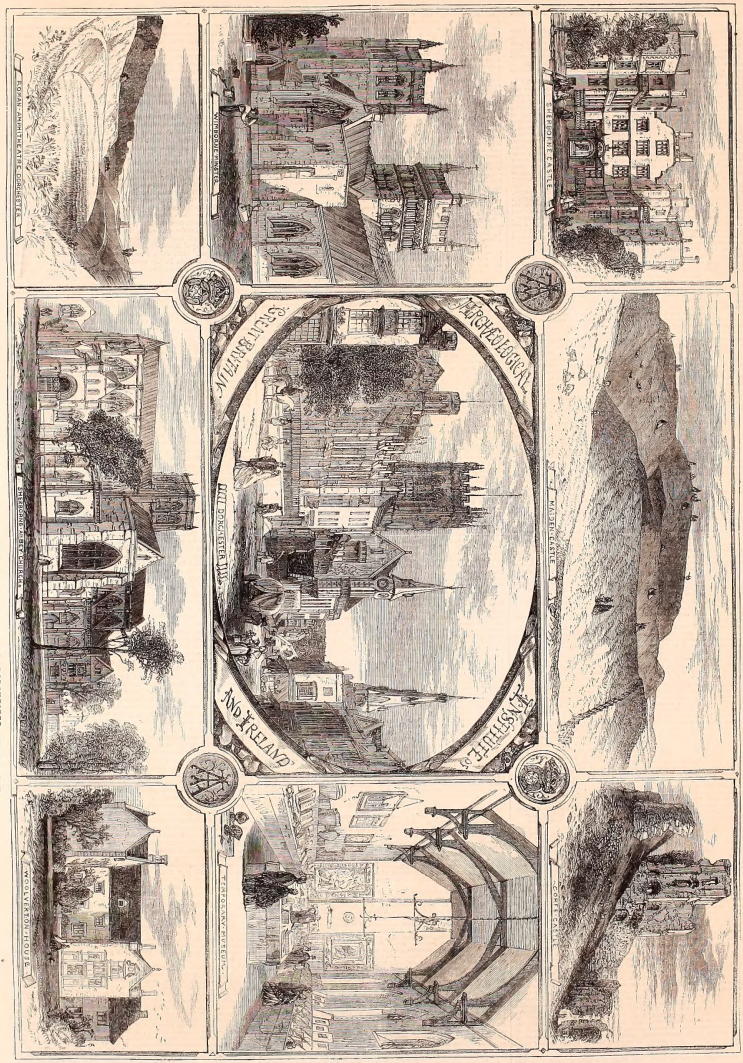
We have only to add that this picture has great truth of character and local colour, together with a correctness and completeness in the drawing and a sober keeping in the effect, which, we regret to say, are not common among pictures by English artists.

NON-EXPLOSIVE GUNPOWDER.



ANOTHER exhibition of Mr. Gale's process for rendering gunpowder non-explosive and explosive at will took place, on Thursday week, in the vacant ground at the back of the Westminster Chambers, in Victoria-street, opposite the Westminster Palace Hotel. Among the spectators were Sir J. D. Hay, Sir Charles Fox, Admiral Fanshawe; Captain Hall, R.N.; Mr. Glaisher, Mr. T. Lucas, Mr. Bateman, Mr. Maclean, Captain Shaw, and other gentlemen of scientific or practical reputation. The experiments were simple enough, and our Illustration gives a fair notion of the scene which they presented. A strong fire, contained in a temporary stove of piled-up bricks, and a large wooden table to support the materials about to be experimented with, formed the only appliances requisite, except some slow matches, fuses, and a red-hot poker. Mr. Gale, in the first instance, exhibited his own powder, which on former occasions was spoken of in general terms as the protective mixture, but, having been patented, is now declared to be simply glass ground as fine as possible. He next preceded to test its qualities when mixed with gunpowder in various proportions. It was contained in four small bowls. In the first bowl the proportion of each was equal, and, on the match being applied, there was rapid combustion, but no instantaneous explosion as in the case of genuine powder. In the second bowl, which contained two parts of glass powder to one of gunpowder, the burning was much slower; and in the third, where the proportion was increased, at the rate of three to one, only a small portion of the gunpowder was burnt, and the remainder was left so cool, and, generally, in the same state as it was previous to the fire being applied. It was, however the last experiment which was to prove the merit of the invention, in not only rendering gunpowder non-explosive, but free from risk of combustion. Here, the mixture was in the proportion of four parts of the glass powder to one of gunpowder, and, on the fuse being inserted, it immediately went out, and there appeared to be no more danger of explosion, or even of ignition, than if it had been placed in so much dry earth. Next, a small powder-keg filled with the four-to one mixture was subjected to the test of a red-hot poker with no other result than a dull smouldering and a great deal of smoke, but nothing approaching to an explosion or even a flame, and it was only by a continual stirring that the burning could be kept up. Small tin boxes, containing each 1lb. of the same mixture, were thrown upon a fiercely-burning furnace, but it was long before ignition took place, and the tendency was rather to deaden the fire than to increase its intensity. A similar effect was produced by a barrel of gunpowder protected in the same proportion by the glass powder. It would not burn, and only smouldered slowly. A further experiment was made to show that the invention possesses another merit—that of protecting powder from dampness, which is so fatal to its explosive power. Gunpowder, mixed in the proportion last described with the glass powder, was placed in a tumbler, which was filled up with water and allowed to stand for half an hour. At the end of that time the water was removed, and the gunpowder, on being separated from its antidote by means of a fine sieve, was found, with the exception of a small quantity at the top, perfectly dry, and it exploded as readily as the best powder would do. The glass is ground so fine as to feel almost as soft to the touch as bakers' flour. Though Mr. Gale has for years been endeavouring to discover a means of rendering powder non-explosive, it was almost by accident that he hit upon this substance. The principle of the discovery is briefly this:—The ground glass being non-combustible, and completely separating each grain of powder from the other, the instantaneous ignition from grain to grain, which takes place when a light is applied to any body of genuine powder, cannot occur. "The process," it is said, "cannot injure the powder. The cost is very small, and it has the advantage of being readily applied. In five minutes a barrel of powder can be made non-explosive, and in another five minutes it can be restored to its original condition. Gunpowder subjected to this process can be stirred with a red-hot poker without an explosion. If a shell burst in a store filled with the prepared powder it would not fire it. The process can readily applied to the largest or the smallest quantities, and it does not require any cumbersome apparatus. The invention will solve the serious difficulty which has been felt as to the storage of powder in time of peace, and in war it will avert the danger which now arises from the necessity of fighting in the neighbourhood of an explosive material." It may, however, be objected that the use of this invention will involve five times as much stowage room—that is, if the white powder is employed in the proportion which affords a perfect security against explosion. The weight is also a consideration.

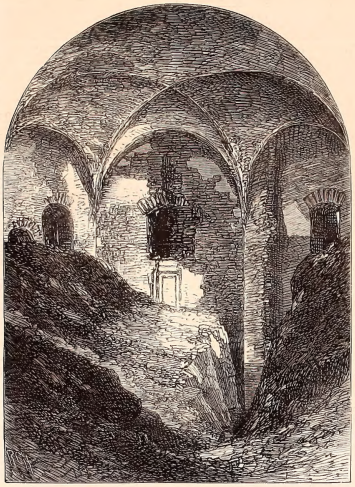
THE ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND—CONGRESS AT DORCHESTER.

IN our Journal of last week we gave a report of the proceedings of the inaugural meeting of the Institute, at which the Marquis of Ccamden, the president, expressed his regret that the chair had not been occupied by the noble Lord (Ashley) who seconded should have filled that honourable position, the late Earl of Shaftesbury, who was conversant with all Marquisate had been called to the hereditary dignity of the Earldom, and he assured them he would endeavour to supply the best of his ability.

The Rev. C. W. Bingham, Rector of Melcombe Horsey, then proceeded to read an introductory paper "On the Antiquities of Dorsetshire." There are few areas so interesting, more peculiarly called for, than the county of Dorchester we have to-day before us, the twin giants, frowning over Millstone Hill, Ambrey, and Hod and Hambledon Hill, called "the Giant's Chair," and "the Giant's Head," Bere Regis to Woodbury Hill, and Maiden Castle, Dorchester, Weathershed Castle, Sherborne, Badbury Rings, and all the numerous, but scarcely indicated in the county; and who has detailed that any admirable account can hardly be given. Many antiquities, which have been supposed to be detected of British and Roman origin, and discovered Roman coins, and finding Roman pottery, and of the most decided character, have been amongst the coarse unglazed pottery of the Celtic tribes. In Dorsetshire is the Celtic rules in Dorsetshire is the Celtic grant Prehistoric, and of the Celtic, or the heath near the Old Sherborne Castle, and Ridgeway, called the Ridgeway, a vast and extensive camp, which is still a work of very great interest. A few flint weapons have been found, but still in the majority of instances, the implements of stone, ironstone, &c., are found. The Roman remains, consisting with the site and roofing tiles, and pottery, and coins, and other remains, are found in the county, the sight of the main road from Dorchester to Exeter, also the fosse and the cremation of the dead, were found, and the remains of a Roman encampment at Hambledon Hill, and, near the spot, the remains of a Roman encampment at Hambledon Hill, and, near the spot, the remains of a Roman encampment at Hambledon Hill, and, near the spot,

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THE Knebworth fête of the Guild of Literature and Art continues to afford a theme for spiteful criticisms on the part of a few journals, whose vocation, it seems, is to be malicious, and which are nothing if not malevolent. I don't think it matters very much if two such old friends as Sir Bulwer-Lytton and Mr. Dickens were cordially complimentary to each other after a capital luncheon; but I think the managers of the guild ought not quietly to submit to be pooh-poohed and sneered down, and that it is a duty they owe to the public and the sacred dowry, and that it is a duty they owe to the public and themselves to come boldly forward, vindicate their position, and make an explicit declaration of what they have to do in future as an explicit declaration of what they have to do in future as regards the guild is that its conductors should, after their luncheon, go sleep for another eight or ten years. In such a lapse of time their casual capital may again be at interest and accumulate; but the interest taken by the public in general, and more especially by the members of the whole scheme will decrease, and at last become altogether extinct. There is not the slightest use in trying to keep up the fête on a pretext for sending the begging-box round. Authors, while they can write as well paid as they do now, are a singularly independent race; while so sensible and business-like an organisation among literary men with a view to securing an honorable provision against the time when they are old and broken and able provision against the time when they are old and broken and able provision against the time when they are old and broken and able to write no more, as there is among persons at the bar or in the army, all these things the Literary Fund does with quiet and considerate kindness.



I see advertised for publication a "Legacy of Pen" bequeathed by poor Frederick Locker. This is probably the Mr. Locker of a pamphlet well known in the States, and widely circulated during the Fenian scare. In that pamphlet, dedicated to Mr. Abe's father, a letter of the Irishmen attributed to Mr. Lincoln must be considered apocryphal, for the reason that it is not in the style of the man. Take, for instance, the story of the Widow Zolikoffer's Milliner. "A lady, a widow, and although I am a black-skinned negro—one of the best educated in the English collection. The widow whether it be a Dutchwoman, and lived in Boston—Zolikoffer was a Dutchwoman, and lived in Boston—Zolikoffer was a Dutchwoman, and lived in Boston—Zolikoffer was

THE LATE MR. ISAAC TAYLOR.

ISAAC TAYLOR died on the 28th of June, at Stanford Rivers, a quiet country retreat where he had passed the last forty years of his life. Born at Lavenham, in August, 1787, just before the breaking out of the French Revolution, he would in a few weeks have completed his seventy-eighth year. Belonging to a family in which literary talent seems to have been hereditary, Isaac Taylor at an early age abandoned the profession of an artist, to which he had been trained, for the more congenial pursuits of authorship. In 1818 he became a regular contributor to the Eclectic Review, then in the height of its prosperity, and his articles soon began to attract attention. But, a few years later, he found himself trammelled by the restraints which are involved in contributing to a review, and betook himself to independent authorship. A volume entitled "Elements of Thought" was, we believe, his first venture in this new field. It was an attempt, and a successful one, to present the rudiments of intellectual science in a form adapted for educational purposes. This work was followed by the "History of the Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times," and by a companion volume, entitled "The Process of Historical Proof." These works, though well received by the public, excited no marked sensation. At last, at the age of forty-two, Mr. Taylor published, anonymously, a work which placed him in the first rank of the writers of the day, and which rapidly attained a widely-extended popularity. This work was "The Natural History of Enthusiasm," a sort of philosophical analysis of the social and religious problems of that age of mental ferment and excitement. Two companion volumes, "Fanaticism" and "Spiritual Despotism" soon followed, and were eagerly welcomed by an expectant and admiring public. Mr. Taylor's next work, however, is perhaps that which has been the most warmly prized by his admirers. In his character of a lay theologian he brought forward a series of religious speculations and devout reflections. This work intended as a preparation for the more direct religious exercises of the Sunday, was entitled "Saturday Evening." It is, indeed, a storehouse of profound thought, expressed in the massive and harmonious style of which Mr. Taylor was so great a master. "Saturday Evening" was followed by the "Physical Theory of Another Life," a work which appears to have been one of the detached essays of "Saturday Evening," extended to the dimensions of a volume. This series of works had all been published anonymously. Regardless of literary fame, only the faint echoes of which reached him in his retirement at Stanford Rivers, Mr. Taylor seemed to wield his pen with far greater freedom and power when protected by his shelter of anonymous authorship. This shelter was now reluctantly surrendered under the pressure of an urgent requisition to the unknown author to stand for the chair of logic in the University of Edinburgh. In this contest, happily for himself, in the University of Edinburgh. In this contest, happily for himself, as he himself afterwards thought, Mr. Taylor was defeated, and the late Sir William Hamilton was elected by a slender majority. While superintending, in person, the education of his own family, Mr. Taylor now published, under the title of "Home Education," some thoughts on that subject which had suggested themselves to his mind. The happy influence of a country life, the educational value of children's pleasures, and the importance of favouring the natural rather than stimulating a forced growth of the child's mind, are among the matters powerfully insisted on in this volume.

Mr. Taylor's leisure hours had for many years been occupied with the construction of ingenious mechanical devices, for the invention of which he had great aptitude. One of these—a machine for engraving on copper plates—was at last perfected and applied to the production of the plates of Dr. Traill's translation of "Josephus." The invention, beautiful as it was, proved, financially, most disastrous to the inventor, and involved him in liabilities from which he only escaped in the last years of his life. As is usually the case, the invention, after ruining the inventor, passed into the hands of others, and realised for them large returns. The beer-tap in ordinary use was also the invention of Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Taylor's studies had led him through the whole range of patristic literature, and it was therefore hardly to be expected that he should refrain from taking a part in the controversy which the "Tracts for the Times" excited, which the "Tracts for the Times" excited, which the "Tracts for the Times" excited,

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Aug. 7).—Our market to-day was but moderately supplied with English wheat. Owing to the disagreeable character of the weather, prices advanced 2s. to 3s. per quarter; but the demand was by no means active. Foreign wheat was in fair request, at fully 2s. per quarter more money. There was a steady inquiry for barley, at full currencies. Malt produced rather higher quotations. Oats were in good request, and realised nearly the late rates. Beans and peas fully maintained former prices, all kinds of flour 1s. per barrel, dearer.

English.—Wheat, 42s. to 52s.; barley, 24s. to 32s.; malt, 42s. to 52s.; oats, 20s. to 28s.; rye, 30s. to 32s.; beans, 30s. to 34s.; peas, 32s. to 34s. per quarter; flour, 30s. to 40s. per 280 lbs.

Scotch.—The amount of business doing in corn is very moderate, at about late quotations. Mustard seed, white, 9s. to 10s. per bushel; tawed, crushing, 5s.; cake, per quarter; rapeseed, 40s. to 42s. per last; linseed, English, 50s. to 52s.; Baltic, 48s. to 49s.; cake, 4l. 10s. to 4l. 15s. per ton; do., do., per 200 lbs.

Bread.—4d. price of wheaten bread in the metropolis ex-tem. 3½d. to 4d. Seconds, 3d. to 3½d. Households, 2½d. to 3d.

Averages.—Wheat, 46s. 6d.; barley, 29s. 6d.; oats, 23s. 6d.; rye, 30s. 6d.

Seventh Gazette Sold Last Week.—Wheat, 54.8d.; barley, 36.2 ; oats, 24.10 ; rye, 30.0.

Tea.—There is much less activity in the demand for all kinds, and prices have slightly declined. The stocks in warehouse are 6,000,000 lbs.

Sugar.—The transactions in raw qualities have fallen off, and prices have declined 6d. per cwt. Refined goods are in fair request, and fully last week's rates. Refined goods are also steady at late rates.

Coffee.—The demand for most descriptions is sluggish, at full prices. The stock consists of 11,624 tons, against 9,648 tons in 1864.

Provisions.—The butter market is steady, at late rates. The demand for bacon is fair, for other provisions inactive, at late quotations. Lard and hams are rather dearer. Other provisions are dull.

Tallow.—Town, on the spot, is firm, at 42s. to 42s. 6d. per cwt. Stock 28,324 casks, against 17,536 casks in 1864. Rough fat, 2s. 11d. per 8 lbs.

Oils.—Linseed oil is selling at 32l. to 32l. 5s. per ton. Cocoa-nut is offering at 44l. to 47l. and fine palm, 42l. French properties, 41l. per ton.

Spirits.—All kinds of rum are a slow inquiry, at late rates. We have no change to notice in the value of brandy or geneva. Cognac is firmly held.

Hops and Stocks.—Old Weather bag, 4l. to 4l. 10s. ; new ditto, 2l. 10s. to 3l. 10s. ; new Yearling, 1l. 5s. to 2l. 5s. ; new ditto, 2l. 10s. to 3l. 10s. per cwt. Duty free.

Coals.—Haswell, 20s.; Tees, 19s. 6d.; South Durham, 18s. 6d.; Wylam, 19s. 6d.; Hetton, 20s.; Tanfield Moor, 19s. 6d. per ton.

Potatoes.—Fresh arrivals supplies are in full average, and the quality, at from 70s. to 120s. per ton.

Manchester, Castle Market (Thursday, Aug. 10).—There was about an average supply of beasts on sale to-day, in consequence of the cattle fair being held in the neighbourhood. The trade was dull for the qualities, and, generally with Monday, of fully 2s. per 8 lbs. The show of sheep was moderate, and the middle trade was very dull, at 2s. per 8 lbs. lower than last week. Calves were in fair supply, and few lambs were on offer. Both sold, however, progressively at barely late rates. Calves were in good supply and sluggish request, on former terms. No available change took place in the value of pigs or milch cows.

Wool.—Since the offal—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; second quality, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d.; prime large ditto, 4s. 10d. to 5s.; prime Scots, &c., 5s. 4d. to 5s. 8d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d.; second quality, 4s. 10d. to 5s.; prime ditto, 5s. 2d. to 5s. 6d.; prime Southdown, 5s. 8d. to 6s.; large coarse calves, 3s. 4d. to 4s. 0d.; prime smaller sorts, 4s. 10d. to 5s.; large lambs, 6s. 0d. to 6s. 4d.; and small pockets, 6s. 8d. to 7s. 0d. per 8 lbs. by sinking the offal.—Town supply: Beasts, 1,100; sheep and lambs, 5,000; calves, 600; pigs, 350. Foreign: Beasts, 500; sheep and lambs, 1,000; calves, 100.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Only moderate supplies of meat have arrived here since last week, and the trade has been dull during the

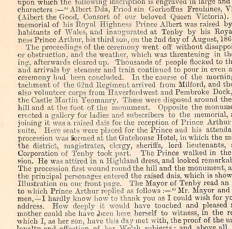
THE QUEEN DOWAGER OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Upon the death, last year, of the late King of the Sandwich Islands, Kamehameha IV., we engraved his portrait and gave some account of his life and reign. We now give a Portrait of his widow, the Queen Dowager Emma, who has come to England on a visit to Lady Franklin, and with the purpose of interesting the friends of English Church missions in the welfare of the Christians among her own people. It may be remembered that her husband was the Hawaiian King who invited the planting in his dominions of a branch of the English Church, the King who himself translated the English Prayer-book into the native language, and wrote the preface to it, which the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge have published as one of their own tracts. The Queen Dowager Emma is partly of Hawaiian and partly of European race: her father was one of the native chieftains, and her mother was a grand-daughter of John Young, one of the companions of Vancouver. She was married to the late King in 1856, but her only child died in 1862, and the throne is now filled by her husband's brother, with the title of Kamehameha V., who has upheld the constitutional government which was instituted in 1848. The Chamber of Nobles and the Chamber of Representatives are convoked every two years, and it is their duty to make the laws and to vote supplies. The present Cabinet is composed of Messrs. Cromier de Varigny, Minister of Finance; R. C. Wyllie, Minister of Foreign Affairs; C. G. Hopkins, Minister of the Interior; C. C. Harris, Minister of Justice; and E. H. Allen, Keeper of the Seals. M. Cromier de Varigny is a Frenchman, who, though only thirty-five years of age, has been a resident at Hawaii for ten years, and was called to office by the present Sovereign on his accession to the throne. Being already a member of the French Consulate, M. de Varigny only accepted office with the consent of the Emperor. Mr. Wyllie is of Scotch origin, and has held his present office twenty years. Mr. Hopkins is English, and is the brother of Mr. Manley Hopkins, the Hawaiian Consul-General in London, author of a good book on those islands. Messrs. Harris and Allen are both Americans. The Bishop of Honolulu is an English clergyman, who went out in 1861.

EMMA, QUEEN DOWAGER OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.



THE WELSH MEMORIAL OF THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT.

His Royal Highness Prince Arthur, who is fifteen years of age, made his début in public life, on Wednesday week, by formally inaugurating the statue of his late father which has been erected at Tenby as a monument of the loyal affection of the people of Wales. The foundation-stone of the pedestal for this monument was laid by Mr. George White, the Mayor of Tenby and chairman of the committee, a few days before last Christmas. The site is upon the summit of Castle-hill, a peninsula jutting out into the sea from the town, and its elevated position brings it on a level with the top of the spire of the parish church of Tenby. It is therefore visible at a great distance both at sea and from the land. The statue of the late Prince Consort is 8 ft. 9 in. high, carved from a block of the finest Sicilian marble. It stands upon a pedestal 18 ft. high, which is formed of grey marble (the native limestone of the district), and has four engraved panels of Sicilian marble. The pedestal rests upon a platform, at the top of three ranges of steps, forming a square of 23½ ft. The blocks of the foundation are grafted into the solid rock and surrounded with a mound of earth, neatly turfed. The figure stands with the head uncovered, and baton in hand, attired in Field Marshal's uniform and wearing the mantle and collar of the Order of the Garter. The sculptor is Mr. John Evan Thomas, a native of South Wales; and the attitude of the statue, as well as the likeness, is striking. The pedestal was built by Mr. Thomas, of Pembroke, under the superintendence of Mr. H. Maull Finch, architect. The panel to the statue's right hand presents a shield, upon which are sculptured, in high relief, the arms of the earliest Kings of Wales, borne by Llewyn ab Gruffyd, the last native Sovereign. The panel behind the statue is distinguished by originality of design. It represents the monogram of her Majesty and Prince Albert within an escutcheon, which is supported, on the one side, by the rampant "Red Dragon of Cadwalader," while the other side rests upon a lock—a scroll being interwoven, inscribed with the old motto, "Anorchfygol Ddraig Cymru," which, being interpreted, means, "The Dragon of Wales is invincible." Henry VII. raised triumphantly the banner of

THE BRIGHTON RACE CUP

AT the Brighton Races, on Wednesday week, the most valuable prize (a piece of plate of the value of £400, added to a sweepstake of £10 each) was won by Mr. W. S. Cartwright's horse Ely. This Brighton Cup, of which we give a Portrait, is the work of Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. The design, by Mr. T. Brown, who has modelled the figures in the centre, is worthy of the time-honoured incidents connected with the town or neighbourhood of Brighton. The figure with mitre and crozier, on the top of the lid, is Bishop Brighthelm, from whom the town, formerly called Brighthelmstone, derived its present name. On the opposite side is sculptured the death of Harold at the Battle of Hastings and William the Conqueror presenting the manor of Brighthelmstone to Earl de Warren. The handles of the vase display the arms of the Brighton Corporation.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

A meteoric stone which fell about five miles from Copiapo, in Atacama, was found, on analysis by Mr. C. A. Joy, to be composed of 37·48 parts of iron, 1·77 nickel, 0·02 alumina, 0·19 sulphur, 1·93 silica, 1·73 soluble, 1·01 magnesia, and small quantities of manganese, cobalt, and phosphorus.

To prevent the too rapid and irregular boiling of liquids in chemical operations, Mr. Brine first proposes to surround the bottom, even the sides, of the vase with short discs of asbestos, the evaporation or distillation being then carried on over a sand-bath. He finds dilute phosphoric by surrounding the retort with a metallic envelope, the space between which is filled with mercury, and heated by gas.

The results of M. Hunaman's researches on refrigeration appear in the Comptes Rendus. He finds that water mixed with equal quantities of water and any of the following salts—the nitrate of chloride or sulphate of ammonia, soda, or potash—very soon becomes very cold indeed. Hunaman gives also the results of combinations of two or three of the above substances, which produce a cold of 0° Fahr. He considers dilute phosphoric acid to be a very powerful agent, as it is rapidly cooled without contact with the saline mixture, which is placed in a distinct receptacle.

Colonel Charles Ramsdell, of Helsingfors, in Finland, has published a drawing and description of a curious relic of the ancient and accidental movements of the earth. The following are the fundamental principles which he has laid down:—1. Lines of the direction and power of great forces in the earth's surface. 2. Lines of the direction and power of great forces in the earth's interior. 3. Centre on a plane surface on which lines of the earth's surface meet. 4. Centre on an earthquake hall, where the various lengths are equal. 5. Centre on an earthquake hall, where the event is indicated on a plate of polished glass by a line-drawer attached to little carriage suspended between two very massive springs.

Franklinite is a black vitreo-metallic substance, found in New Jersey. It is only slightly magnetic. Lead is the blowpipe test for zinc, and cobalt for manganese, according to Berthier, in—peroxide of iron, 66·66; oxide of manganese, 16; sesquioxide of zinc, 17. Hitherto it has been merely an object for the cabinet. We now learn that, when it is combined with forged iron or steel, it gives counter-fine iron, which he has cementate, and which is not destroyed by the action of heat.

Professor De la Rive (of Geneva), while commenting on the electric phenomena of the great storm of May 26, points out the increased amount of danger incurred by the aggregation of numbers of individuals in a narrow space, as, for example, when they seek the shelter of a tree during a storm to ride scouring elevated places, and recommends as much as possible isolation from all living beings. At such a time, he considers that none could be more dangerous than a troop of soldiers marching in close rank with bayonets fixed to their muskets.

M. Peyrat has reported to the Academy of Sciences at Paris on memoirs of his experiments illustrating the nature of the rare metal thallium. The chief of these is the production of a new diamond, discovered in 1789, and from which Berzelius obtained the metal in 1824. M. Troost procured the metal in the metallic state, by heating one part of the double fluoride of strontium and potassium with one part and a half of aluminium in a hydrogen atmosphere. On treating the mass with water, a metallic powder remained, which, by hydrochloric acid, strontium remained, with a little aluminium. Pure strontium is obtained by heating the amalgam obtained by electrolysis. It is malleable and brittleous. Its true symbol is hydrobromic acid.

Professor Schiff, of Florence, Professor Schelbl and M. Ciaibli, in the sea, between six and twelve miles off Civita Vecchia, with the view of testing the transparency of the water. While about 1,000 metres (from 0·73 metres in diameter) were immersed at various depths, in very calm weather, when the water was extremely clear. The greatest depth at which the largest disc could be seen was 42·5 metres, when the sun's altitude was 30° 30'. The disc was then suspended again, in its form, but the colour varied from white to a greenish tinge; then to a clear blue, and finally to the same colour as the water. These gradations, it is clear, are not dependent on the sun, but on the different degrees of density of the water.

The Annals of Natural History for August will be specially interesting to advanced students, being chiefly composed of memoirs by specialists on various points of natural history. Mr. Bloxham's descriptions of recently-discovered species of Hymenoptera, Mr. Verrall's on Diptera, and Mr. Stainton's on Tineina are the notes by Dr. J. R. Gray, giving the results of his long-continued observations on the habits of the Hippopotamus in the Society's gardens, which, although caught at the mouth of the Thames, is found to be of the same species as those of the Nile. The female was made in which the sow-eye extracts the juice of the sugar-cane by means of the long points of its incisors, and gives other particulars of that singular animal.

Professor Owen most suitably begins the new number of the Geological Magazine with an illustrated description of a new genus of extinct mammal (Mesolophus) from the London clay. In the following paper Mr. C. W. Peach describes the remarkable traces of glacial action in the Shetlands, and also alludes to the destructive effects of the terrific sea which is breaking away the hardest rocks in a rapid manner. No organism has been found in any of the glacial deposits. In another paper, Mr. D. C. Davies gives the results of a walk over the Lias, Oolites, and Red Sandstone near Oswestry, and gives his idea of the geological history of the neighbourhood. This magazine is becoming very serviceable as a record of the proceedings of provincial geological societies, such as those of Glasgow, Norwich, Scarborough, &c., whereby many valuable facts and remarks are brought before the eye of London students.

THE ANCIENT CHURCH OF ST. PUDENTIANA, AT ROME.

THE Church of St. Pudentiana has long been known as the earliest foundation of any church in Rome, and it is called, on an inscription in the church, "The Mother of our Churches." The dedication of it is recorded by Baronius, in the "Annals of the Christian Church," to have been made, A.D. 160, by Pope Pius I. A letter of that Pope is printed in the "Annals," in which he says:—"I have made a church in the Bathe of Pudens, and have dedicated it in honour of the Sister Pudentiana the Martyr." Novatus and Pudentiana were two of the children of Pudens, the Senator mentioned in his wife Claudia, who were amongst the earliest Christians in Rome, and all of whose children were among the early martyrs of the Christian Church. Both Pudens and Claudia are mentioned by St. Paul as friends at the end of his letter to Timothy, written shortly before his death. The site of Novatus were made in his father's house, about A.D. 90, and the house was then commonly called "The Baths of Novatus." Pudens the senator was a person of considerable importance and great wealth, and his house was thrown open for the reception of all foreign Christians coming to Rome, as is mentioned in the history of the martyrdom of Justin Martyr, in the second century. This house is also said to have been the earliest place of assembly for the Christians of the Gentile Church at the same time that the house of Priscilla and Aquila was for the Jewish branch of the Christian Church; but the authority for this statement is rather doubtful. It is certain, however, that the house of Pudens was a large and spacious family palace, occupying an ancient site, and, like all the ancient palaces of Rome, had been partly fortified—not surrounded by a deep fossa or dry ditch. The road, or via, was originally at the bottom of this fossa, as were the case throughout Rome; but in process of time this roadway was raised to the level of the second story—probably when the palace was rebuilt, in the first century of the Christian era. There were then two stories below the level of the street, as is the case with many of the ancient houses in Rome, partly owing to the very uneven ground, and partly to make it convenient to raise the level of the road across the valleys. In these underground chambers all the early churches in Rome were established, and the line of Constantine's new and larger churches were commonly built over the old ones, which were either destroyed or used as crypts under the new churches, as was the case with St. Pudentiana. But the church occupied only a small part of the palace, and was entered on the side of the palace on the great Basilica of Constantine, which was made in the Lateran Palace, and is now called St. John in the Laterean. That palace was probably larger than the palace of Pudens; but the one illustrates the other, and in the Lateran Palace were made a convent, a hospital, and a church for the Popes, and still a portion used for the Lateran family, some of whom continued to reside there as late as the fourteenth century, as appears from inscriptions on the columns in the church. Somerset House, in the Strand, is the building which gives the nearest idea of the ancient Roman house or palace, and the original church would be not in the lowest story, which consisted of cellars only, but in the second story, and it is probable that on the instance of St. Pudentiana, the clerestory windows appear to have opened into an area just below the level of the ground.

The existence of this ancient church had been entirely forgotten until the recent investigations of Mr. J. H. Parker. It is filled up with rubbish, and has been used as a stable in from above twelve to clerestory windows, and this is said to have been done in the beginning of the sixteenth century, at the time of the revival of Paganism in art, when the old Christian churches were utterly despised, and treated with every sort of contempt. This change with earth is said to have been done by order of the Pontifical authorities in order to keep the Pope's stables out of the Lateran Palace. Mr. Parker applied for permission to empty out the earth from this interesting old church, but the Pope refused to sign the order granting the permission, and consequently to him for his purpose, which is usually considered a mere formal act. It is possible the Pope may have feared that the old Christian Church should attempt to make such a discovery, because the house of Pudens is closely connected with the Saint Prisca and the Aventine Hill, which is very unpalatable at Rome. According to the British legends, this house was also the first place of assembly of the early British Christians, but also went by the name of the British Palace in the first century of the Christian era, when it was the residence of Caractacus, and the whole of the British Royal family, during the time of their captivity in Rome. Claudia, the wife of Pudens, was the daughter of Caractacus, and there is no improbability in the tradition that Pudens received the whole family into his house or palace. St. Paul is said to have been a constant visitor to this house, and the whole family to have been among the early Christians. St. Pudentiana was the name of the daughter of Caractacus, was a British Princess, and, with her sister St. Praxedes, was also canonised. Theodoret, in his twelfth book of his "Annals," records the taking prisoners of Caractacus and the whole of the British Royal family, and their being carried captive to Rome. Martial mentions repeatedly in his epigrams, one of which is written on the occasion of a visit of Claudia and her husband Claudia, of whom he says that, "though born of the painted Britons, either Rome or Athens might be proud of her;" from which it appears that she had been educated and celebrated for their beauty in those days as we have. Another epigram is written on the birth of their first child, and another on the birth of their second child, and they seem continued always on friendly terms with the family.

The two pictures represent one of the chambers of the Baths of Novatus, evidently made in a house previously existing, with plaster and painting of the style of the first century over half the walls, and the alterations; the other the church made in the bath, with one of the arches of the nave, the two columns on one corner, and the arch through the side walls, with massive piers left between them. These arches are formed of the Roman tiles, flat tiles, in the first century, and the whole of the work is of the character known as the brickwork of the time of the Empire.

The English church at Wiesbaden—the foundation-stone of which was laid about two years ago, by Sir Alexander Malet, late Britannic Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to the Germanic Confederation at the Wednesday week, dedicated, under the title of St. Augustine of Canterbury, by the Bishop of Oxford, assisted by the Archdeacon of Surrey, the Rural Dean of Aldershot, the Rev. C. Hoffert, Secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the Rev. Prof. Hof-Marschall Baron Müffling, who represented the Duke of Nassau, and other clergymen. The Duke of Nassau, the Hereditary Grand Duke of Luxemburg, the Prince and Princess of Wied, the Hereditary Prince of Solms-Braunfels, the Town Council, the Protestant Landesbischof and clergy of the town, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and many others, were present at the ceremony of the English clergy. The building is in the Decorated style, with nave and apse, and is calculated to hold 300 persons.

The Anglo-French Working Men's Exhibition was opened, at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, on Monday last. An address was delivered in the morning by Mr. Herbert Mackay, of the well-known engineering firm; and the Rev. Dr. Emerton, of Boston, U.S., preached in the evening. The "Hallelujah Chorus" was performed on the great organ, and several speeches were made. The exhibition, which contains many objects of considerable interest and occasionally of great beauty, is intended to commemorate the jubilee of peace between England and France, which have now maintained a friendly understanding for fifty years. The whole show is arranged in part of the gallery to the north of the Handel orchestra, and is laid out with considerable taste as regards its effective exhibition. Its contents are of the most miscellaneous character, ranging from articles of vertu to the commonest implements of household use, from carvings to objects of the most utilitarian kind. Of course, there is much in it unusually fine collection. Some ivory carvings are also very well worth attention, though the real gem of the exhibition is an effigie figure of a golden eagle executed in chased copper by Mr. Phillips. There are some very good working models of machinery, especially a beautifully-finished miniature copy of the engines of the Minotaur, sent by Mr. Penn, one of the guarantors.

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE AT JERUSALEM.

IT has lately been announced that the Empress of the French, who takes a particular interest in the preservation of the relics of ancient antiquity in Palestine, had invited the other Imperial or Royal personages of Europe to assist in forming the Roman Catholic subscription towards a fund for the repair and restoration of the Latin Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. The Greek Church, which is indeed part of the same building, has been sufficiently maintained at the expense of the Emperor of Russia; but the Latin Church, as shown in our Illustration (from a photograph by Mr. James Graham) has been allowed to fall into a very dilapidated condition. The entrance under the Rotunda, with a circular opening at the top, resembling that of the Pantheon at Rome, stands directly above the alleged site of the burial-place of Jesus, which is a small square recess in the rock, containing a shelf or slab of white marble, worn with the kisses of hundreds of thousands of pilgrims, described as a sepulchre hewn out and votive gifts, and illuminated by forty-two lamps of gold and silver. This vault is covered by a dome roof on short marble pillars, and surrounded by a sort of inclosure adorned with columns and pilasters, in which is the stone that was rolled away from the door of the sepulchre, and where the angel sat after the resurrection of our Lord. The smaller dome over the Latin Church belongs to the Greek part of the Church; it is supposed to cover the exact centre of the earth, and is marked by a single marble column. The Gothic doorway in the Latin seen to the right hand in our Engraving, gives entrance both to the Latin and to the Greek churches, and, as we enter by it now open, the other having been walled up long ago. Still further to the right, proceeding from the Latin Church, we remain in a massive campanile, once a noble tower of five stories, but now cut down to three. The whole group of buildings, which comprises the two basilics or cathedral, including several different chapels, oratories, and shrines, was originally erected, by the Emperor Constantine and his successors, in the fourth century, but was destroyed by the Mohammedan conquerors, and afterwards rebuilt by the Crusaders, in the twelfth century. The Greek portion, which occupies the nave of the great cathedral, was comparatively new, having been reconstructed after the fire, which did much damage, in 1808. The sculptured doorway and the tower above mentioned are fine specimens of mediæval architecture. The exterior of the Rotunda, formed of plaster of stucco, presents a wretched appearance of squalor and decay, as shown in our Illustration.

The Silesian Gazette states that Prince Napoleon has presented to the library of the University of Breslau the grand edition of the correspondence of Napoleon I., consisting of the fifteen volumes published.

A plan of preventing boiler incrustations, recently adopted in France, consists in lining the boiler with a metallic network at some distance from the sides. The lime-salts will of course be deposited upon the net-work, from which the crust can be easily detached.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Life of Richard Cobden. By John M'Gilchrist. (Lockwood and Co.) Sinners is not the least beautiful of our many beautiful counties, and not the least lovely of the lovely villages of Sussex is Midhurst. It is not due, however, to the charms of natural scenery that Midhurst is henceforth historical, but to the fact that it or its neighbourhood was the birthplace of Richard Cobden. For no greater trophy has for many years been added to the spoils of Death than the body of the noble free-trader, whose name was held in reverence both abroad and at home; for he was one of the exceptional prophets who are not without honour even in their own country. It is true that he was rejected of many Englishmen, and that his doctrines were hailed with more universal respect across the Channel and across the Atlantic; but he had a strong and influential party behind him, too, and after his death scarcely a single detractor. To his lot it fell not only to leave his name up in a place of honour in English history, but, to date; not only, by "an admirable innovation in diplomatic interpretation," to be described by the terms of the highest eulogium that can to-day (a compliment which the bound himself, no doubt, have gladly dispensed with) services held for the peace of his soul in the Cathedral of Belgium—but, in addition to a very ambitious man; but, then, his ambition was to serve his country and benefit his race. Had he desired titles, and orders, and ribbons, few men could more easily have obtained them. Had he hungered for office, few men would have had less difficulty in getting it, by asking and not asking, be told, solicited, and refused. The life of such a man deserves to be widely read, and it would be satisfactory to be able to say that Mr. M'Gilchrist's biography is all that could be desired; but the volume is little more than a compilation from the numerous speeches and writings added to some meagre private information.

Sketches from Cambridge. By A Don. (Macmillan and Co.) The don is no Quixote, but rather a shrewd, practical man, with a gift of easy writing, with a power of graphic description, and with an abundance of the quality of humour. He has collected into a volume the pen and scarlet covers twelve very lively and amusing papers which first appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette. He has chosen a subject which, since a rigour scarcely to be expected from such a being as the imagination of young people would expect to find in a don, writing either a still-limited, parchment-skinned, lantern-jawed walking dictionary, or a mincing, pimpled, pert-faced, simpering exquisite with a bibber. You, then, who have been to Oxford or Cambridge, and "who you have not," may agreeably pass away an hour or two in reading these lively "Sketches from Cambridge."

The Letters of Sydney Smith. Edited by Mrs. Bidwell, F.R.G.S. (Chapman and Hall.) The late Mr. Cobden once said, "If I were a rich man, I would endow a professor's chair at Oxford and Cambridge, to be united to a professorship of the principles of free trade and free history. I would undertake to say, and I speak advisedly, that I will take any intelligent man who has taken his degree at Oxford or Cambridge, put his finger on Chicago, and I will undertake to say that he does not within a fortnight make a map of it." The fact is the undergraduate probably knew "all about the geography of the Bosse." Indeed general information upon any subject, from "Cookery to the Isthmus of Panama is in a little better condition; but, nevertheless, a series of Parliament lately returned a member for a district was one of the northern or southern States of America, and how it would probably be decided by the unhappy struggle between those States? A banker asked, "in the middle of the week, what effect would the railway across the isthmus would be completed?" A gentleman from Cork "wanted to know whether Panama was one of the islands there were not still cannibals there:" and an English lady, "who, on her arrival at Boston, heard for the first time of the existence of the American steam-engine, anxiously begged to be informed what will beat it was used for roasting." Some account of the early days of a land which unites the continents of North and South America, which means by nature destined to be the "great highway of the nations," and which has a deeply-interesting history, appears likely to be as useful as it is entertaining. The value of the work is greatly enhanced additionally acceptable by the fact that it is written by a competent authority—the British Vice-Consul at Panama.

After Forty Years. By George MacDonald, M.A. (Hurst and Blackett.) It is like breathing fresh air—like plunging into cool water—to turn from one's skin or worldly-minded fellow-creatures for repentance, to read some portions of this three-volume novel. It exhales the most pure, healthful atmosphere of holiness, meekness, and purity; and a perusal of it is as refreshing as a day's trip into the country. The author is a clergyman, and he has occasionally indulges in German sentimentality; occasionally uses what is to some persons a disagreeable and unnecessary amount (for why should one speak of "God's sun" any more than of "God's black-berries?"); and very frequently indulges in somewhat prosaic over-argument (relieved, however, by the broad Scotch dialect), which is in spite of what sermons say, an apt conductor of dry humour) upon points of religious controversy; but, on the whole, the volume is good. He does not aim at subtlety of plot and intricacy of machinery; he only aims at simplicity, and obtains his object. It is difficult to imagine that the "robustious" reader would soon tire of the story; it appears to be instructive and delightful reading. Mr. MacDonald or Anderson will be "a thing of beauty," and, therefore, "a joy for ever;" and his delightful character will make his readers love and sympathize. The effect upon Alec Forbes of disappointed love is to be expected. Alec rejected love and found it in the arms of disappointed love is to be expected. Alec rejected love and found it in the arms of debauchery! Canant ever our large-hearted, fine-minded, and inventive author forget that one grander subject for a grief-stricken noble nature than whisky and wickedness? He is capable of much more and nobler than whisky and wickedness? He is capable of much more and nobler than whisky and wickedness? He is capable of much more and nobler

MEETING OF THE NATIONAL VOLUNTEER ARTILLERY ASSOCIATION AT SHOEBURYNESS.

THE meeting of the National Volunteer Artillery Association for practice at Shoeburyness, which had continued during the whole of the week, was brought to a close, on Saturday, by the presentation of prizes to the successful competitors in the spacious drill-shed of the Royal Artillery barracks at that place. The Illustrations we have engraved present a good view of the general appearance of the ground, with the targets, and a nearer view of the apparatus at one of the marking-points. The firing on these occasions takes place from the platforms, which, as visitors to Shoeburyness will recollect, are erected just above high-water mark, overlooking that wide waste of sand from which the sea at low water retires for a distance of five miles. It is on this tract of sand that the targets are erected. The first graze of the shot is indicated with perfect precision, and afterwards it goes ricochetting seaward, only some of the Armstrongs fired at high elevations going beyond low-water mark. The guns employed were 18-pounders, 32-pounders, and 68-pounders. The targets were made of canvas, 12ft. wide by 8 ft. high, and placed at 1250 and 1500 yards. The target of course forms the point that is aimed at; but as shots which do not strike the target have value within certain limits of contiguity, those limits are marked out by red flags stuck in the sand, in the form of narrow parallelograms inclosing the target. Thus, at 1250 yards range, every shot striking within a parallelogram 30 yards long by 4 yards wide, scores six points; and if the target is struck an additional point is scored, making seven, the highest possible value of a shot. Every shot striking within a parallelogram 120 yards long by 8 yards wide counts four; and every shot striking within a space 160 yards by 12 counts two. At 1500 yards the spaces are respectively 30 yards by 4, 120 yards by 12, and 170 yards by 18. The system of marking adopted was one tried for the first time at Shoeburyness, and pronounced by the Royal Artillery to be very efficient for the purpose. It is the invention of Captain Vidler, of the Cinque Ports (Rye) Artillery. The apparatus consists of a species of wooden target formed of three flaps of equal size, which can be raised by pulleys into a horizontal position. When one flap is raised it indicates that one point has been made, when two are raised it shows that two points are made, and when three flaps are raised the maximum three points are recorded. One of these signalling semaphores is placed parallel to the target, out of the line of fire, to show elevation, and another is placed nearer to the firing-point to show deflection, the latter being readily distinguishable by the aid of the flags and a good glass, or even by a practised eye without artificial assistance. The practice was conducted, on this occasion, under the supervision of Colonel Fisher, R.A., with the valuable and cordial assistance of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Royal Artillery stationed at Shoeburyness, who evidently intended that no exertions should be wanting on their part to make the meeting a success. Lots were drawn by the different

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE DOWAGER COUNTESS OF SHAFTESBURY.

The Right Hon. Anne, Countess Dowager of Shaftesbury, who died at Richmond, Surrey, on the 9th inst., in her ninety-first year, was the fourth daughter of George, third Duke of Marlborough, K.G., by his wife, Caroline, only daughter of John, fourth Duke of Bedford (whom he married 164 years ago), and was great-great-granddaughter of the illustrious John, first Duke of Marlborough, the hero of Blenheim, and grandniece of John Winston, ninth and present Duke of Marlborough. Her Ladyship was married, on Dec. 10, 1792, to Anthony Ashley Cooper, fifth Earl of Shaftesbury, who died on June 5, 1851, and by whom she had issue, present Earl of Shaftesbury, K.G., and other children, all whom survive her; and three daughters-viz., Lady Caroline Mary, widow of Sir Thomas Heald, Esq., of Gretleton, Wilts; Lady Harriet Anne, wife of the Right Hon. R. T. Lowry-Corry, M.P.; and Lady Charlotte Barbara, widow of Henry Lester, Esq., of Bawton Castle, Salop.

GENERAL THE MARQUIS D'HAUTPOUL.

Alphonse Henri, Marquis d'Hautpoul, a General in the French army, Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, and Grand Referendary of the Senate, who died, on the 27th ult., at the Château de St. Tropez, Var, was born in 1789, in the department of the Aude, belonged to the old noblesse of Languedoc. He was born at Versailles, on April 4, 1789, his father being at the time a cavalry officer. He himself commenced his career at nearly Oct. 22, 1805, when sixteen years of age, as a student at an military school at Fontainebleau. The next year saw him a Sub-Lieutenant of the 30th Regiment of the Line. With it he went through the campaigns of 1806 and 1807, and was present at the battles which were wounded at the Battle of Eylau, and was made prisoner and carried to England, where he remained till the conclusion of peace, in 1814. Louis XVIII. made him a Knight of St. Louis, and, for his gallant conduct in the Spanish war of 1823, a Colonel of the Garde Royale. D'Hautpoul's other career—that of politics—we need not here comment on in detail, save to say that he was a member of the Chamber of Deputies for his native department of the Aude, in Languedoc, by 1837, and sat till 1848. On the 10th of May in that year he became a Lieutenant-General in 1841, and he commanded, in 1842, the eighth military division. He, after the revolution of February, 1848, was a candidate for the Legislative Assembly; and the electors of the Aude were again faithful to him, and sent him to the Chamber which nearly divided men in his favour. He was made Minister at War in the Cabinet of October, 1849, and held office till the end of December in the same year. On the 20th day of December he was upon the constitutional formation of the executive of the Senate he was named to it, and made one of its principal officers as Grand Referendary. The Marquis d'Hautpoul has held no office under the Government of Napoleon III. as Emperor.

PROFESSOR AYTOUN.

William Edmonstoune Aytoun, Esq., Advocate, Sheriff of Orkney and Shetland, and Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh, was descended from a Scottish gentleman who settled in Fife. He had, for a year or two, retired for part of the summer recess to Blackhills, near Elgin, a residence which he had leased for the season. He was much in Edinburgh, and the other country recreations which he loved so well; and it was there that he contracted the illness which has terminated his life at the early age of forty-five. He was born in the city of Aytoun, Leicester, and was the son of Roger Aytoun, Esq., a lawyer of position in Edinburgh, where he was born in 1813, and received his education at the Academy and University of Edinburgh. He was distinguished among his class-fellow by the elegance and readiness of his English and Latin compositions. In 1831 he gave to the public his first work—a poem on "Poland," the inspiration of which, magnificent and manly, will be doubtless drawn from the then stirring events of the Polish revolution. In 1840, Aytoun, whose studies had taken the direction of the law, was admitted as an Advocate. At the Bar he did not attain a leading place, though he acquired some practice and a certain business. His proclivity and his taste, however, made him a favourite among his fellow-practitioners. In 1845 he was appointed to the chair of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh; and, in 1865, was made Sheriff of Orkney and Shetland. He married about this time the youngest daughter of the famous Professor Wilson, the Christopher North of Blackwood's Magazine. Professor Aytoun received from the University of Oxford the degree of D.C.L. Professor Aytoun was, however, known, for his literary labours, to the public nearly thirty years, have been constant, and arduous. He has had a life-long connection with Blackwood's Magazine, and contributed many articles from the contributors to Fair's Magazine. To Blackwood's he was wont to contribute under the name of "Augustus Translations," and "The Glenmutchkin Railway," "Life and Times of Richard I.," and he stamped himself at once a poet by the publication of "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers," which has gone through numerous editions, and has been widely read through seventeen editions, and in connection with which his name will be associated with the Scottish nobility. He, in 1849, published his graceful and spirited translation of the "Poems and Ballads of Goethe," executed in conjunction with one of consummate skill and scholarship, Theodore Martin, Esq., the well-known author of "Bothwell," a poem of much merit: "Formillian, a Spasmodic Tragedy;" and, with Mr. Theodore Martin again for collaborator, the "The Bon Gaultier Ballads."

PREBENDARY MORTON.

The Rev. James Morton, Prebendary of Lincoln and Vicar of Holbeach, Lincolnshire, whose death has just occurred, was a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and was made a B.D. in 1824. He was ordained in 1811, and in the following year was appointed Assistant Preacher at the Rolls Chapel, and to the Perpetual Curacy of Leighton Beaudesert in Lincoln Cathedral. He was also a Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury. He was the author of "Monastic Annals of Yorkshire," and "The Semi-Saxon Legend of St. Katherine of Alexander."

Dr. S. P. Woodward, of the British Museum, of whom we last week gave a notice, was, on the 3rd inst., appointed a descendant of Dr. Gray, Woodwardian Professor of the Geological Professorship at Cambridge, and Dr. S. P. Woodward's family themselves very warmly supported the appointment.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

Probate of the will of the Right Hon. Henry Viscount Maynard, of Easton Lodge, near Dunmow, Essex, and of 39, Grosvenor-square, was proved, by the principal registry, by the testator's brother and executors, Henry Gibson, Esq., of Ongar; and the Rev. G. E. Symonds, B.A., of Tilty. The other executors appointed were his grandson Viscount Maynard (born since he died in 1857), the late Lord Braybrooke, and William Gibson, Esq., also deceased. The personalty was sworn under £70,000. The testator succeeded to the title on the death of his uncle, in 1824; married in 1819; and died, on the 3rd inst., at the age of May last, at the age of eighty-six. Lord Londesborough was a friend of the court, and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Essex. The will was executed on Dec. 31, 1863, and a codicil thereto on the 1st of February, 1861. His estates, in the counties of Essex, Leicester, Cambridge, Northampton, Maynard, who died in the 2nd of January, 1865, and who was the heir by which the title becomes extinct, and the property descends to the son's eldest daughter. To the latter he has made provision for the younger unmarried daughters, the two eldest of whom are married; and has left annuities to his wife and to Mrs. Gibson, Maynard, and the children of the latter, bequests to likewise annuities and legacies to his servants. By a codicil his Lordship states that he has found by the practice of letting his estates from year to year, inducing poor on his estate at low rents, and was erecting other cottages; and directs that the rents of the farms hereafter let shall be proportionately raised to the cottages.

The will of Andrew Robert Drummond, Esq., of Cadlands, near Southampton, and 2, Bryanston-square, and of Charing-cross, banker, was proved in the London Court on the 26th ult., by the executors, sworn under £70,000, the executors appointed being his sons, Edgar Abeling Drummond, Esq., and the Rev. Robert Henry Drummond, the testator's brother-in-law, died April 11, 1865, aged 76; died, on June 29, at the age of seventy-one. The testator was the son of the late Andrew Drummond, Esq., of Stanmore, Middlesex, and was the brother of the late Henry Drummond, Esq., and Mary, daughter of John, second Earl of Egmont, and married, in 1821, to Elizabeth Frederica, daughter of the late Sir Robert Buttland, K.C. The testator confirms the settlements made on his marriage in favour of his wife, and with reference to the sum of £20,000 settled £2000 per annum, and leaves to her Ladyship a choice of residence, with furniture, carriage, &c., and an immediate legacy of £1000. To his son, Andrew John Drummond, he has secured a life annuity of £2000. To his daughters he has likewise devised his estate at Cadlands, and bequeathed to her made provision for all annuities and legacies; and, as regards his daughters, he intimates that he has already provided for an marriage, and has left legacies and annuities to his servants.

The will of James Henry Crawford, Esq., formerly of Bombay, but late of Brighton, was proved in London under £20,000 personalty, by the executors mentioned being his sons, James Henry Crawford, Esq., his executor, Robert Wigram Crawford, Esq.; and Henry Ray Frendaid, Esq. The testator bequeaths to his wife £1000 and the income derived for his daughter, Mrs. Frendaid, £1000 on her marriage. To his daughter Mary he bequeaths £1000 on her marriage, and a sum of £2000 in trust for the advancement of such of the sons of the late daughter Helen Critchfunk as may require it. He has also made provisions for her daughter, appointing his said son James residuary legatee, and to whom he has made specific bequests of plate, &c., presented to him by native friends at Bombay, as well as of various silver cups won by his horses at the racecourse at Bombay.

The Emperor of Morocco has issued an edict interdicting the punishment of amputation without the consent of law, and forbidding the people to present, and the officials to receive, bribes. The injustice would still be considerable, of anyone who suffer from it, are invited to appeal to his Majesty, who promises them the fullest satisfaction.

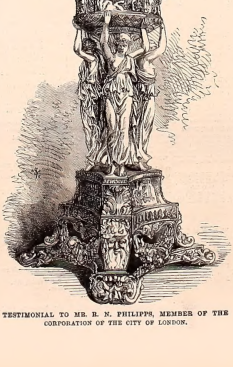
NEW ORGAN FOR BOMBAY CATHEDRAL.



MONUMENT TO COUNTS EGMONT AND HORN, LATELY ERECTED AT BRUSSELS.

THE NEW ORGAN FOR BOMBAY CATHEDRAL.

A FINE organ, the outward aspect of which is shown in our Illustration, has been constructed by Messrs. Bishop and Starr, of Marylebone-road, for the Cathedral Church of Bombay. The front was designed by Mr. Roger Smith, under whose superintendence Mr. Tarver prepared the drawings for the details of the ornamental work; the case being of massive oak, with a superstructure of ironwork, enriched with copper and brass; the ironwork by Messrs. Feard and Jackson. The whole of the interior woodwork is of hard mahogany, to suit the climate of India, and the pipes are of spotted metal. The total number of pipes is 1574, ranging from 2ft. to 16ft. feet in length. There are three complete manuals, or key-boards, the compass of each being from CC to G in alto, fifty-six notes; with an independent pedal organ compass from CCC to E, twenty-nine notes. The public performances, which were given by Mr. W. T. Best, of Liverpool, and by Mr. C. Bullivant, to large audiences, at the manufactory in Marylebone-road, proved the qualities of this noble instrument.

THE MONUMENT OF COUNTS EGMONT AND HORN AT BRUSSELS.

THE seventy-fourth anniversary of the birthday of King Leopold of Belgium was celebrated at Brussels this year by the inauguration of the monument to the memory of Counts Egmont and Horn, or, as the name is more correctly written, De Hornes. It is the supplement, in stone, of the famous picture, by Gallait, which, at the Exhibition of 1862, by the tragic horror of its subject and the startling realism of its treatment, excited so much attention. But here there is nothing to startle or to shock. The heroes of Gravelines and St. Quentin, the illustrious D'Egmont and De Hornes, are represented on their way to execution, their martyrdom in their country's cause having been compassed by the treachery of Philip II. of Spain, and carried out by his unscrupulous agent, the Duke of Alva. A few words on the pedestal, as simple as dignified and impressive, give the day of their death, and record that this tribute of their country's appreciation of their worth is erected on the very spot where, 300 years since, their heads fell beneath the axe. History has been faithfully carried out even to the gestures and costumes of the unhappy men. The Count D'Egmont, in marching to the place of execution, waved his handkerchief as a last adieu to his friends and comrades in arms. He wore a remarkably rich dress, the collar of the "pourpoint," however, being cut away by himself prior to leaving the prison, that the headsman's dexterity might not be interfered with. The Count De Hornes went to the scaffold bareheaded, grasping convulsively the Milanese "toque," or cap, which he carried in his hand—the whole expression and deportment of the man was one of indignant protest at being thus repaid for a life's devotion to his country. D'Egmont's bearing, whilst equally dignified, was more resigned. He was the first to suffer, and his mangled corpse must have been the last object upon which the eyes of his friend rested—a crowning injury to his outraged heart and spirit. Their bodies were conveyed to the cathedral of St. Gudule, where they were laid out in state, a magnificent funeral service being performed over their remains—the Duke of Alva graciously permitting them to receive the homage in death which their bravery and integrity had so dearly won. One of the two figures that support the pedestal wears the costume of the light cavalry commanded by the Count D'Egmont; the other, that of the dragoons commanded by De Hornes. The work is by M. Fraikin, and is much and deservedly admired. It is sober in conception and solid in execution. The artist has justly thought that no sensational effect was necessary to enhance the simple pathos of the fate of two innocent and honourable men, condemned to an ignominious death by the most atrocious tyranny that the history of modern Europe has known.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. R. N. PHILIPPS, MEMBER OF THE CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. R. N. PHILIPPS, OF THE CITY CORPORATION.

AN active and useful member of the Corporation of the city of London, Mr. R. N. Philipps, having discharged much important business as chairman of the committee of the Court of Common Council appointed to regulate the functions of the officers and clerks to the Corporation, it was agreed by his colleagues, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen who belong to that committee, to present him with a testimonial when he retired from the chair. This gift took the shape of a richly-chased silver centrepiece épergne, on a tripod base, with ornamental fruit and flower festoons, surmounted by silver figures supporting a vine and grape basket for fruit or flowers, with an inscription recording the occasion and bearing testimony to the "ability, courtesy, and successful exertions" of Mr. Philipps, as well as "the value of his services to his fellow-citizens." We have engraved a representation of this piece of plate, which was delivered to him at a dinner, some weeks ago, at the Brunswick Tavern, Blackwall; Mr. J. Symonds, who has succeeded Mr. Philipps in the chairmanship of the committee, presided at the dinner, and amongst the company were the Lord Mayor, several of the Aldermen, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, M.P., Colonel Sykes, M.P., and the Master Cutler of Sheffield. Mr. Philipps being a native of Sheffield, and a magistrate for the West Riding of Yorkshire, several gentlemen from that part of the country took part in this demonstration of personal esteem.

The trustees of the National Portrait Gallery have purchased and added to their collection an oil-painting of Richard Cobden, M.P., executed at Paris, in 1861, by a Neapolitan artist, G. Farcuari. It is lifesize, and represents the statesman seated at a table with the French Treaty of Commerce before him.

THE BISMARCK POLICY.

COUNT BISMARCK'S international policy is worthy of that which he is pursuing with inflexible purpose at home. "Help yourself, no matter at whose expense," might be its characteristic motto. Selfishness that never blushes and audacity that never hesitates are its two main ingredients. It cannot be denied that it has achieved considerable success. This has happened, however, not so much on account of its inherent force, as of the sagacity—or we may more fitly say craft—with which it has been directed. The statesmanship to which public opinion is of no account, which regards the power to do a profitable wrong as a sufficient justification of it, and which sees in a neighbour's weakness the best possible reason for torturing him with insolent exactions, is oftener than not successful after a fashion; but whether, on the whole, it has reason to rejoice in its gains is quite another matter. Count Bismarck is unquestionably an adept in the application of his system. He can calculate to a nicety when, with whom, and how far he may safely play the bector. In the affair of the late war with Denmark for the duchies, he had ascertained beforehand the neutrality of France and Russia, and he knew well enough that England, even if disposed, could not strike an effectual blow in time to save his destined prey. He is now resorting to the same tactics against the German Bund and Austria, and by driving them to alternatives which he is aware they cannot and will not face, he is appropriating exclusively to Prussia the booty which they helped her to seize.

There has been quite a visible flutter at Vienna within the last fortnight. M. Bismarck had, after beating about the bush for several wearisome months, at last avowed his aim. We say "avowed his aim," because, although he had thrown over his purpose a veil woven of diplomatic propositions, the veil was too flimsy to conceal from anyone his real meaning. Prussia was to annex Schleswig-Holstein to her dominions, and to pay Austria her expenses in the Dano-German war. Austria, astounded at the barefacedness of the proposal, but unprepared to reject it in a peremptory tone, respectfully asked a territorial equivalent for the surrender of her claims, and would be satisfied with a slight rectification of her frontier bordering upon Silesia. This proposition Prussia indignantly refused. Whereupon there was immense diplomatic excitement. The Hapsburg family held a council at Vienna. The King of Prussia convened his Cabinet at Ratisbon. There was a talk of war between the German Powers as imminent. All the extra mechanism of diplomacy was put in motion. Rumour, of course, outran fact. It was said that Austria had dispatched a mission to Florence, with a view to ascertain how far recognition of the kingdom of Italy might keep the Italians quiet. It was even surmised that, by consenting to a transference of Venetia to Victor Emmanuel and by reinstating the autonomy of Hungary, Austria might put herself into a position to side with the minor German States, bid defiance to Prussia, and wrest back for herself the leadership of Germany. Count Bismarck, however, knew better. He knew that either he or Austria must give way, and he rightly calculated that, if he did not, Austria would. The difference is not yet settled, but a telegram has authoritatively assured Europe that it will be adjusted without a resort to arms. The two Sovereigns were to meet this week, and, no doubt, the Bismarck policy, ostensibly modified but substantially unchanged, will prevail.

The issue of this "pretty quarrel" over the proceeds of spoliation in Denmark may be easily accounted for. Count Bismarck spied, as, indeed, anyone might do with half a glance, Austria's weak place, and resolved, before it was strengthened, to take advantage of it. She holds sway over a wide geographical area, the people of which consist of heterogeneous races whom for many years back she has been vainly striving to weld into political and administrative unity, and the most powerful of whom, convinced at last of her mistake, she is preparing to conciliate, by the restoration to them of provincial self-government. She has a large army which her policy of suppressing national instincts has rendered necessary down to the present time; and, unfortunately for her, she has an exhausted Exchequer. She has a traditional claim upon the position of supremacy in the German empire, which, although, favoured by the southern kingdoms and several of the smaller principalities, the distracted elements of her own dominions make it all but impossible for her to enforce. In their forced unity she has sought that strength which would have enabled her to take the pre-eminence which was once her own, and which she still regards as her due, and she has found in it reckling but waste and weakness. She cherishes better intentions for the future, but she has not yet had time to give practical effect to them. Whilst, like a ship on the rack, the empire is for the time being overdone, Count Bismarck bears down upon her in a threatening manner and makes an impudent demand which she is not just now in a safe position or in time to resist. What can she do but temporise, and, if that be impossible, submit? She is paying the penalty of her past folly. Her sin has found her out, and she is made to drink the cup of humiliation to the dregs.

But the Bismarck policy, triumphant as it seems, entails consequences which Prussia will one day see, which by their own per individuals can act on the system of aggrandising themselves at the cost of every neighbour whose hour of weakness exposes him to aggression without treasuring up against themselves a store of ill-will which may by-and-by wield a most formidable, perhaps ruinous. Europe watches M. Bismarck's reckless proceedings with suppressed indignation; and, although it can find no pity for Austria, it takes note of Prussia's disregard of the plainest rules of international honour. The public opinion, which the latter chooses to insult, will one of these days become necessary to her: she is by no means placed above the reach of danger—and then she will look round for it in vain. At any rate, her audacious Minister is not lessening his difficulties at home by the unprincipled character of his policy abroad. The Prussian people, not indisposed to receive an accession of territory even when it comes into their hands, are none the more inclined to surrender at his bidding their constitutional rights, nor are they likely to be pleased with the terrible unpopularity which his high-handed proceedings have brought upon the name of Prussia throughout the rest of Germany. No one can pretend to foresee exactly the course which affairs will take; but everyone can guess that the statesman who raises up hosts of enemies, foreign as well as domestic, and whose self-will disdains to keep up even the appearance of upright dealing, places himself at the mercy of any accident which may set on fire the passions of the people—

And when he falls, he falls, like Lucifer,
Never to rise again.

One can scarcely resist the temptation of looking back upon the incidents of the last two years, as supplying the best possible justification of that policy of non-intervention which now guides the action of our own Foreign Office. It is quite clear that German affairs are sufficiently complicated to the last degree without being squared by external meddling. The internal ambitions, jealousies, combinations, dissensions, and intrigues which beset the Governments, great and small, of the Confederation, are those which keep the whole country weary, can only work out their own cure by being left to themselves. They constitute the natural fermentation which precedes ultimate homogeneity and national union. We may watch their mutual operation with interest, but without anxiety. We say unequivocally condemn, as we do, such policy as that which commends itself to the judgment of Herr von Bismarck, and deeply regret even its temporary success. But, inasmuch as we are not masters of that knowledge by which alone the true process nations may be best advanced towards maturity, while we are sure that any interposition of ours would be both costly to ourselves and worse than useless to those whose welfare it might intend, we congratulate the country on the present inaction, in which it has been happily kept. No doubt, its moral influence in opposition to political immorality, wherever it may show itself, may be exercised with advantage; for, in the long run, "right, not might," is the true opinion. It is by this means, and by this only, that Germany can be effectually benefited from without. The reflex action of European sentiment will yet tell upon the imbecility of the Court around the Schleswig-Holstein invasion, and M. Bismarck will not be the first statesman whom events will have taught that (to quote the language of some old English divine) "Man proposes, but God disposes."

THE QUEEN'S DEPARTURE FOR GERMANY.

The Queen's departure for Germany, on Tuesday week, when she embarked at the Royal Arsenal Pier, Woolwich, on board the Alberta, the tender to her Majesty's yacht the Victoria and Albert, has already been reported in our last Publication. It was in the evening, at twenty minutes to seven, when the Alberta, conveying her Majesty and the Princesses Louise, Helena, and Beatrice, attended by Lady Churchill, General Grey, the Duchess of Roxburghe, and Lady Churchill, with some of the officers of the Royal household, left the Pier, and steamed down the river. She joined the Victoria and Albert, not at Sheerness, as originally intended, but in Sea Reach, just below the Chapman, since the evening was very fine, and her Majesty preferred to make the passage down the Thames in the daylight. The Engraving on our front page this week shows the Alberta on her way to the place where the Victoria and Albert lay, and as she reached shortly before nine o'clock. Her Majesty and the Prince, with their suite, then embarked on board the Royal yacht, and Albert, which last came down to Sea Reach, early in the afternoon, to be in readiness to receive the Sovereign. The squadron, after nightfall, presented quite a novelty, in the line of ships being all brilliantly lighted cabin and mast-head lights. The Trinity yacht Irene and the Thames Conservancy Steam Launch, with the Commodore of the squadron on board, were in attendance upon the Royal yacht, on her passage down from Woolwich. There was some disappointment at Southend and Sheerness among the visitors who swarmed the beach, is being anticipated that the Royal squadron would have brought up at the Nore. At daybreak, next morning, the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, the Alberta, and two other steam-yachts, the Osborne and Fairy, proceeded down the river, on their way to Antwerp. There was a slight haze round the shore, but the sun shone brightly, and the water was like glass, hanging over the water; but the effect of the mirage was delightful. The Royal squadron made a pleasant passage across to the Scheldt, and arrived at Antwerp at seven o'clock in the evening, when her Majesty, after an interview with the Duke de Marmier, Governor of Antwerp, who went on board the Royal yacht, at once proceeded by railway to Darmstadt, and, next day, to Coburg.

An admirable statue (in marble) of the late Mr. James Wilson, for many years Secretary of the Treasury and afterwards Finance Minister of India, has been executed by Mr. John Steell, of Edinburgh, her Majesty's sculptor for Scotland. The statue is commissioned for the city of Calcutta, where, shortly after Mr. Wilson's death, a subscription was entered into for a memorial to record his eminent services in reorganising the financial administration of India. The figure is over lifesize, and is a companion work to the marble statue of the late Marquis of Dalhousie, previously executed for Calcutta by the same sculptor.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Empress, on Saturday last, received the troops in garrison at Fontainebleau, when she presented the Cross of Commander of the Legion of Honour to Baron de Gondrecourt, Colonel of the mounted Chasseurs. Her Majesty, with the Prince Imperial, and the Empress Dowager, visited whether the Emir Abd-el-Kader also hoisted himself, to witness the great military spectacle on Tuesday.

The Longchamps fête day was celebrated on Thursday, At six in the morning the guns of the Invalides ushered in the national fête. No barriers was raised on the Boulevards; not even newspaper stalls warked. The day was given over to amusement, and the night to gazing upon the gorgeous illuminations, for which extensive preparations had been made. The open-air amusements and the illuminations were also visited by Imperial visitors.

Senators, members of the Corps Législatif, and all State dignitaries were summoned to a solemn reception at the Tuileries, on Friday (to-day), and the following circular was addressed by the Minister of Justice and Public Worship to the Archbishops and Bishops :—

Monseigneur,—In the title of Sovereign Pontiff, which the people, carrying their thoughts to the future, will join to his glorious name, they express their wishes. They will pray for the Sovereign whose indefatigable activity carried him to the East, to the West, and to the most distant countries, to bring to the Holy See the support of its inexperienced pilgrims, and to offer to its enemies reconcile with the impulse of the warmest charity; they will pray for the Prince Imperial, who can already feel the influence of these noble examples, and prepare himself under the aegis of these virtues for the glorious destiny which awaits him. The people, Monseigneur, will add to its prayers the energy and the faithful to manifest their gratitude and hope in the Divine protector; and I cannot doubt that every Bishop will associate in his written pray, Monsigneur, to be good enough to order a solemn Te Deum, for to-day by reason of the Emperor, to be sung on Assumption Day, 15th of August, the duches of your diocese at the termination of the mass. The events will account for the delay in the circular. "Bientôt sur mes pas" would be too necessary to accuse.

A similar circular was forwarded to the directory of the Augsburg confession, the Israelite consistory, and the consistories of the Reformed Churches.

The subjoined circular was addressed by the Minister of the Interior to the Prefects :—

Monsieur le Préfet,—In a few days the populations will agree to celebrate the Emperor's fête by a week with inspiration. It is a solemn anniversary in which the whole of France loves to manifest, with all the spontaneousness of her gratitude, her attachment and her devotion to the person and to the glorious dynasty of the Napoleons. Prepare, Monsieur le Préfet, the organisation of these rejoicings, and, having regard to the physiognomy of the country, concert with the different authorities of your department. Draw up programmes on the importance of the solemnity and on the means of its proclamation. I especially recommend you to call the attention of the municipal authorities to the fact that the fêtes distributed by the communes must be the means of touching the Emperor's heart as to assist the poor and solace the unfortunate.—Valette.

Tuesday's Moniteur contained the nominations of Baron Haussmann, patroness of the Empress, to be Commander for the deaf and dumb and blind. She sent 74,000, to seventy-five societies of which she is patroness.

On the occasion of the Emperor's fête the Moniteur published Imperial decrees of the 14th inst., one of which was dated at Metz, making a considerable number of promotions and nominations in the Legion of Honour. The Vice-Admiral Count Rigault de Genouilly is raised to the dignity of Grand Cross, and Vice-Admiral Page to that of Grand Officer. Fifty-two officers are also promoted to the rank of Commander, twenty-eight of Officer, and 150 Knights. Another decree, at the instance of the same Minister, confers the Legion of Honour on 141 petty officers, sailors, &c. Colonel Cappy, of the Staff of Marine Infantry, superior commandant of the troops in Cochin-China, has been made a Grand Officer of the Order of Medjidie. Numerous other promotions have also been made in that corps.

The Emperor, by a decree of the 14th inst., has granted Pardons, granted pardons and commutations or reductions of punishment to 1,145 condemned persons of different categories. The Minister of National Guards of the Department of the Seine, who had been condemned for breach of duty, has been set at liberty, and reinstated in his functions. In conformity with a wish expressed by the Emperor, and on the occasion of the Emperor's fête, the Minister of the Interior has ordered the liberation of several young prisoners from the House of Correction of La Roquette.

The French fleet (the vessels composing which are specified in our Naval Intelligence) arrived in the offing at Cherbourg on Monday, and in receiving the Royal Yacht was of the most gratifying character. Fort Roule, the citadel on the heights overhanging the coast, and the batteries and fortresses on the shores of the bay on the right poured forth a thundering welcome, which was taken up and repeated by the ships of war, the guns of which, ranged in line on the quays, the jetties, the quays, the steam-boats, and every available craft that could float, added to the effect. Only three ships of the French fleet—the Couronne and the Flandre—were assembled to meet their English allies; but it was expected that a number of vessels would arrive during the night. At the usual hour the squadron reached Brest. Meanwhile, and until their departure, Cherbourg was en fête; dinners and receptions were the order of the day, and illuminations and fireworks the order at night. At a banquet given on Tuesday, the Duke of Somerset proposed, in a toast "The Emperor Napoleon and Prince Imperial," and the French Admiral replied with one a little more expressive : "Queen Victoria, the Prince Consort, Albert, and the Prince of Wales are the two Governments."

The Review of Wednesday evening describes in its bulletin the circumstances which led to the mutual visits of the French and English squadrons. The Admiral-in-Chief desired that the fleet should be present at Cherbourg on the 15th of August, and France cannot but congratulate herself upon the occasion of friendship and fraternity which has been brought to the British Government."

There was a military review on Monday in the Champ de Mars. The whole Imperial Guard and garrison of Paris were assembled before the new Commandant, Marshal Canrobert. General Bourbaki commanded the Guard, and General Frossard was under charge of Generals d'Autreville, and the Guards under Marshal St. Jean d'Angely.

Baron Haussmann, director of the Paris municipal works, has addressed a letter to the prefects recommending to their notice the establishment of a society for the relief of the unemployed and ill-lodged horses, by means of competitive shows, or trotting and bustle fairs, which are originally intended to be held annually, and have received the support of the enterprise. The General calls attention to the fact that 18,000 horses are annually imported into Paris, and that the money, and hence that, thereof the efforts of the society, France will at no distant period be not only able to provide for her own requirements, but to export a large number of horses to other countries.

The Paris correspondent of the Times, referring to the French foreign exchanges, says:—"Every chance of a speedy fall is gradually disappearing, and, although it is admitted that the produce in some parts of France is above the average, the harvest is not yet so much good in other districts, so that a reduction in the price of wine is not to be looked for in the present century."

M. Emile de Girardin's new play, "Les Deux Sœurs," was brought out last night, and was received with great favour. The house was filled with critics and many distinguished personages, amongst whom were Princess Mathilde and her son Prince Napoleon. The interpolate incidents of the piece did not meet with success. Its plot, like that of his preceding piece, "Le Supplice d'une Femme," turns on the subject of the married woman.

A society of Paris booksellers is shortly to be formed for the purpose of establishing a fund for the relief of their distressed.

Intelligence has been received of the death, at Rodez (Aveyron), of Dr. Bousquet, aged sixty-nine, who, after the Revolution of 1848, having been elected representative for the Seine, became President of the Constituent Assembly, but occupied that high post only until the 15th of May, when the mob broke into the Chamber, and wanted to proclaim the Red Republic. He was not re-elected to the Legislative Assembly. He was a medical man, and published several works, generally of a political character, his opinions being of extreme Radicalism.

The Israelitish Consistory of Oran has issued an address to the Jews in Algeria, congratulating them upon having received the rights of French citizens, and exhorting them to enter energetically on the career of equality thus opened up to them.

AUSTRIA AND PRUSSIA.

According to a telegram from Gastein, the negotiations between the Austrian and Prussian Cabinets respecting the Schleswig-Holstein question have resulted in an understanding about the duchies.

The King of Prussia has injured his eye while chamois-hunting.

The Emperor of Austria has ordered the formation of a financial committee, to place the financial affairs of the empire on a durable basis. This committee is to be composed of the Ministers of State and Finance, the President of the Superior Court of Control, and the heads of all departments. The principal object of the committee will be the reduction of the military expenditure.

DENMARK.

King Christian has announced the Rigsraad to meet for an extraordinary Session, on the 26th inst., at the Castle of Christiansborg.

ITALY.

An Imperial decree has been issued ordering the reduction of the army from 200,000 men to the ordinary peace footing. Two divisions of the Guards, twenty-two divisions of infantry, five brigades of artillery, and ten other divisions will be reduced from the ordinary peace footing to the lowest peace establishments. Two divisions of cavalry are to be reduced from sixteen to fourteen sections, and two divisions of cavalry to be maintained on the full peace footing.

According to a report just published by the Ministry of Marine, the fleet consisted, on the 1st of June last, of 238 steam-ships and thirty-six sailing-ships. Among these are seven steam-frigates, twenty-one screw-frigates, and seventeen screw-corvettes. On the 1st of June last, a plated frigate, a ram, a steamer, and two gun-boats were being constructed at the Royal Arsenals in Genoa and Spezzia. The ram was several bulletins in other seas—such as that in the Black Sea, consisting of three Dutch vessels, the Bersaglio, of thirty-two, and the Son of Asni, of nine; and the Siberian flotilla on the coast of the Pacific, of thirty-three.

The Chancellor has commenced at his taking of the oaths by the gift of 10,000 ducats for the relief of distress in the provinces of Russia afflicted by the famine, and has announced a Proclamation as a contribution to the fund for the construction and decoration of Greek churches in the western provinces, and 6000 roubles to be distributed among the poor of St. Petersburg.

UNITED STATES.

We have intelligence from New York to the 8th inst., at which date the President was reported as being still indisposed, but improving. General Grant was at the Falls of Niagara, Quebec. He was received enthusiastically at Boston.

Jefferson Davis's Counsel in New York are endeavouring to hasten his trial.

The military authorities at Richmond have declared the late elections null on the ground that "loyal" soldiers were excluded from the ballot-box.

The Governor of Kentucky has forbidden persons who have taken part in the voting to vote at the forthcoming elections in the State.

In Nashville, Tennessee, the Democratic candidate had issued a card; but in other parts of the State "loyal" men were returned.

An order has been issued at Washington to muster out of the service all volunteer white troops in Texas whose services could be dispensed with.

Mrs. Lincoln (says the Chicago Republican) is living in perfect seclusion at the Executive Mansion, and will remain there over at night miles from that city. Both her sons reside with her. Captain Robert Lincoln is studying law in the office of Messrs. Scammon, McCagg, and Hitchcock, in this city, and spent there daily; by the United Railroad, to attend to his duties.

The New York Historical Society Committee are ready to receive designs for the monument, which is intended to be a full-length representation of Washington in marble, and will be contained to the monument at Stratford-on-Avon and the Dresdnut print presented to the law firm of Messrs. Lincoln, during 100,000 head of beef and large herds of cattle before them. The Boers, though the first to declare war, appear to be the least prepared to encounter it, and on the attack of their numerous and light-footed foes, who, it is supposed, can muster 20,000 warriors in the field. A musket has been issued by Moshesh, in which the charge consists of sparrel, a weapon that no Englishmen who remain upon their farms in the Free State shall be molested, and protected in every way by the police and the Queen Victoria and her people. All the blame is thrown upon the Government of the Free State. On the foregoing intelligence reaching Capetown the English colonists were promptly warned by the Governor to prepare for taking any part in the struggle, and British troops immediately dispatched to the frontier.

Five thousand pounds have been raised in the colony for the relief of the sufferers from the late terrible gale in Table Bay.

INDIA.

The news from India contains little matter of interest beyond the fact that a rebel Rajah in Oude, who, in 1858, put to death several persons he had taken prisoner during the British advance, has been arrested and sent into Lucknow in irons. Overtures for peace have been made by the Bhootanese chiefs.

CHINA.

The rebellion in the two northern provinces of Shantung and Pechili is gaining ground, and threatening serious consequences. Discontent exists even in the ranks of the Chinese army, and at Hong-Kong twelve battalions out of fourteen stationed there had raised the standard of revolt under cover of the darkness.

NEW ZEALAND.

Melbourne news to the 25th of June contains the information from New Zealand that the Rev. Mr. Richmond Shoreham, known as William Thompson, surrendered to Brigadier Carey on the 29th of May, and that the war with the natives was considered at an end.

The attempt to capture the murderers of the Rev. Mr. Volkner has thus far failed.

From the same source we learn that the Fiery Star was destroyed by fire on the 4th of June, while on passage to Lyttelton from the steamer City of Dunedin, on her voyage from Wellington to Nelson, was wrecked in Cook's Strait, with the loss of all on board, amounting to ninety persons.

AUSTRALIA.

MELBOURNE, June 26.

If it be the privilege of Englishmen to grumble, certainly we have sufficient cause, and we take advantage of our privilege. Just fancy the startling news from home by the April mails—the assassination of President Lincoln and end of Mr. Seward, the surrender of Lee, and the virtual cessation of the American war—coming to us a fortnight after it was due! Had the news been that of war between England and America there is little doubt that the first intimation we should have of it would be the presence of a Yankee fleet in our bay. This state of things is anything but agreeable, and we earnestly implore the Imperial Government to put a stop to it—I mean a stop to the continual irregularity in the arrival of the mail. Experience has proved that, with the right kind of steamers and ordinary precaution and forethought, the mails may be delivered here as punctually as

COUNTRY NEWS.

There is expected that there will be the largest crop of blackberries, nuts, and otherwise that this season in the south of England for has been known for several years.

The late James Brooke, Esq., of Brookhill, near Derby, has bequeathed the whole of his property, amounting, it is calculated, to more than £10,000, for the establishment of a "people's park" in that town.

Accounts from every part of the country show that the cattle disease, and still more the alarm which it is creating amongst the farmers, is increasing at an alarming rate. Markets which a week ago took place are now scarcely even for recapitulation.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has conferred the honour of knighthood on John Hawley, Esq., Q.C., the Queen's First Serjeant in Ireland, in recognition of his efficient and valuable services as chairman of the county of Tipperary. Sir John Hawley was fifty years at the Irish Bar, and spent fifty of them in that county.

At a public meeting of the inhabitants of Portsmouth, held under the presidency of the Mayor, it was decided to celebrate the visit of the Prince of Wales to that town on the 20th inst. by a public dinner. The Mayor stated that the Prince had expressed a wish to spend a few days privately after the reviews and manœuvres for the season and matters of the agricultural show, and consequently he was unable to carry these resolutions into effect.

The Great Western Railway Company has resolved, after all, not to go to Oxford, but to select some station near it where they can find accommodation for their traffic, and there to stop. The Mayor and Council of Abingdon, in reply to an application from the company, have stated that they will not grant the necessary powers for the Great Western to run £2,000 for building purposes.

On Tuesday the foundation-stone of a monument to the late Duke of Athole was laid, with masonic honours, at the top of a hill in the neighbourhood of Inverness. The monument, which is to be a tower of great distance, is to be in the form of a Celtic cross. Mr. Wake Melville, of Dunsinky, Grand Master Mason of Scotland, laid the stone, although the weather was very unfavourable, there was a large assemblage of Freemasons and others present. Lord Strathallan attended the ceremony as one of the Hereditary Bowbearers of Athole, and presided at luncheon after the ceremony.

The Right Hon. Spencer Horatio Walpole, M.P., died at Hastings at Birmingham yesterday week. The question of the revision of statutes and charters, and the number of members to be returned by each, and the claims of the two theological institutions, and brought forward the resolutions at the annual committee of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, resulted into a debt of £2400. To meet this, the committee recommended the conference to make an appeal to the members of the Church, and a public discussion, was agreed to. The general and local committees and offices of the Society, amounting to 200, are to be reduced, and the Diocesan Board to be enlarged, so as to accommodate sixty members. The Rev. Brocklehurst read the resolutions, which were carried unanimously. The total debt of the premises had reached £222,296, and the payments £140,000. The officers and committee recommended that the Society should not be wound up, but that reference to the address of the British Conference. The Rev. Dr. Gregory read the report of the Wesleyan Education Committee. The Rev. Dr. Gregory moved that the Conference the second at 10.30; and all lights out at 11 p.m. On the fourth day Colonel Bruce, the Assistant Inspector of Volunteers for the district, arrived in camp for the purpose of officially inspecting the battalion. The volunteers were put through a series of manœuvres, which lasted about three hours; and at the conclusion of the drill Colonel Bruce expressed himself surprised and highly gratified by the steadiness of all ranks and the great attention that had evidently been paid to drill during the week. He observed that the battalion was as near perfection as possible, and, after thanking Colonel Mansel for all he had witnessed, concluded by saying that he should have the pleasure of making the most favourable report of the Dorset battalion. He then, accompanied by Colonel Mansel, inspected the camp, and was much pleased with the order and neatness of the tents. Next day (the 29th) the tents were struck, and, with the blankets and pullasses, carried into store by ten a.m. The battalion, after being addressed by Colonel Mansel, who offered his hearty thanks to the officers of the staff, the officers of companies, the non-commissioned officers and men for their good conduct, steadiness, and attention at drill, while under canvas, was marched off the ground, and each corps proceeded to its own head-quarters. The encampment has been a decided success, and has been productive of the greatest possible good to all the volunteers, who, while learning their duties as soldiers and improving themselves in drill, have at the same time enjoyed a most pleasant holiday. Our Engraving, showing the encampment and the volunteers just returned from drill, is from an excellent photograph taken by Mr. John Pouncy, of Dorchester, inventor of the new process of photographic carbon-printing.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1865.

When Archbishop Laud was on trial, and it was not found so easy to convict as to abuse him, one of his prosecutors said that, if his Lordship had been guilty of no one great act of treason, he had been guilty of so many petty acts that they came to the same thing. "I never heard before," said Archbishop "Thorough," "that two bundred black rabbits made a black horse." At this time of the year, when England has neither Queen, Lords, nor Commons—when Convocation is up and Westminster Hall described—when the Clubs are given up to waiters, newsmen, and men who declare to one another that they are "only passing through town"—when a carriage in the streets is a sort of apparition, reminding one of the days when Lord Mayor's Shows doors are hermetically (some say, with Mrs. Grundy, arithmetically) sealed; when the crack preachers are wandering, and have ceded their pulpits to nobodies; and when the daily papers have choice only between articles on police cases and on the eternal general principles of Adam Smith and Mr. Mill—at such a time we are inclined to adopt the theory of the prosecutor of Laud, and to see whether our many rabbits will not make one horse. There is generally a period on which one can dilate at any length without becoming a bore, but there are many topics on which a few words may be said. Let us look through the list, as a professed diner-out reviews his themes while waiting to hear the soup.

We were glad to see Lord Leicester's disavowal of any intention to dictate to his tenants at the election. The battle was lost through the indignation which was excited among independent men by the attempt. There is no doubt Lord Leicester declares that an over-zealous agent had misread a hasty note from himself. It was really necessary to say something, and we know not what else could have been said. Captain Jervis's onslaught upon the Eastern Question is premature, may or may not be justified, so far as facts are concerned; but the answer of the officials is very damaging, inasmuch as it represents the fiery Captain's denunciations to be rather opportunities in order to vindicate those who could be useful at his own election. This revelation will not prejudice the public in Captain Jervis's favour, even though his case against the company should be proved. The Government will have to deal with some satisfaction a little paragraph which shows that the Foreign Office has been cudeavouring to make up for the omission in the free-trade treaties, and that in 1868 Belgium will remove the great nuisance, the Scheldt dues, which, in rags, will also afford some advantages. There is a great deal more to be done before the manufacturer can properly be told to hold his tongue. The Bishop of Natal's case we entered into, duly, on a recent occasion; and it may only be necessary to say that he has, under advice, called upon the Colonial Bishops' Fund trustees to set apart the Natal stipend, and that the matter is before the Court of Chancery, but no decision can be given until next Term. We need not repeat what that Oxford is, after all, to be delivered from the menaced incursion of railway workmen; and we hope that the news is true, and care not much whether the result be due to the discovery that the ground is unsafe, or to the power of the Dean and Chapter or to any representations on the part of the authorities of Oxford and others interested in the grand old city. We should prefer, however, to know that the former reason had prevailed, as is most probable, because it is one that will always be effectual, whereas personal exertion and influence are matters of chance. Ballinl College, to its honour, has opened its gates to Roman Catholic undergraduates, and proposes to exempt them from the labours the anichief done by the defection of Spain from the Church, and its recognition of the excommunicate Victor Rumanuel. A full account of this prodigy is in preparation, under exclusive arrangements. The only other striking topic of interest has been a set of curious actions brought by an Irish clergyman at Liverpool against a newspaper and other enemies. He pleaded his own cause, and inflicted terrible speeches upon the Judge and jury, all protest being in vain. His name is Kelly, and he appears to be a Calvinist of a heated kind, and to have got into hot water with great facility; but we make even this guessed statement with fear and trembling, lest he should leap forth at the mention of his name. He was defeated in all his actions. We are not sure that, had he confided his case to counsel, he might not have been more fortunate; but the old proverb about the man who is his own lawyer has again been illustrated.

Abd-el-Kader was doubtless most inhospitably treat ed, and ought to have had a different reception here; but, if people will come to London when other people are out of town, what can be done? The Queen of the Sandwich Islands is, we are happy to see, receiving all attention, but it is from private courtesy. We suppose that William Thompson will be among our next visitors, as he has submitted to the Queen.

Cherbourg has echoed to the roar of English artillery, and, no matter how heavy is our powder bill, we shall always be glad to pay for salutes, as they are assurances against a shot left. This meeting on the waters is, indeed, the only event of the week; and it is very gratifying, but affords no opportunity for any assertion of new doctrine. The closer the bond between France and England the better; and the more we know of one another, the more likely we shall be to get on. Such are the natural reflections which everyone must make on the present occasion, and what more can be said in the most polysyllabic paragraph? The Black Prince is worth the attention of our French friends, and we can only wish that Lord Warrior, the Warrior, had been with her; but this latter, for the invariable reasons of his Grace of Somerset and his colleagues, has been eviscerated. England is, however, ably represented by her fleet in French waters.

And so ends the list which we have ventured to compare to the rabbits of the lamented Archbishop.

THE COURT.

The Queen, accompanied by the junior members of the Royal family and attended by her suite, arrived at Darmstadt, on Thursday week, at nine o'clock in the morning. Her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena, Princess Louise, and Princess Beatrice, and attended by the Duchess of Athole, drove to the Kranichstein to lay the day. The Queen received visits from Prince and Princess Carl, Prince William, and the Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse-Scharenin. Later in the day Princess Helena returned the visit at Rissenhohe. The Queen will pay a visit to the Grand Ducal palace upon her return from Coburg. Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern visits Ireland the day at the Grand Duke's palace at Darmstadt. The Queen resumed her journey to Coburg in the evening, arriving at Rosenau at half-past eight o'clock a.m. yesterday (Friday) week. Prince Alfred and the Duke of Saxe-Coburg met her Majesty at the railway station, and accompanied her Majesty to the castle.

According to the programme, the ceremony of unveiling the memorial to the Prince Consort will take place on the 26th inst., at four o'clock in the afternoon. The monument is now complete. The statue was cast at Nurnberg and the base and pedestal at Wesserstadt, in Bavaria.

The tower of the Rathhaus Townhall, which was burnt down on the 2nd of May last, has been rebuilt of a more handsome form in the gothic style of architecture, and was restored.

Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse are in Switzerland. Their Royal Highnesses will shortly arrive at Cologne, to attend the present at the ceremonial of the 26th inst.

The Queen, accompanied by Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse and the junior members of the Royal family, is expected to return to Windsor Castle from Germany on Friday, the 15th of September. In order to present arrangements, the Court will leave Windsor Castle on Tuesday, the 19th of September, for Scotland.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, attended by the Hon. Mrs. Hardinge and Major Teesdale, left Marlborough House, at twelve o'clock, on Saturday week, for Gravesend, en route for Ostend. The Prince and Princess arrived at Cologne at four o'clock p.m., yesterday (Friday) week, and left that day. Their Royal Highnesses resumed their journey to Coblentz, en route for Rheinhalzbaien, where they will remain until they arrive at Coburg, to attend the present at the ceremonial of the 26th inst.

PRINCE ALBERT.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert having attained his twenty-first year on Sunday week, by order of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, the solemn declaration of the Prince having attained his majority took place on that day in Rosenau Castle. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg, accompanied by Prince Alfred, proceeded to the Hall of Audience, when State Minister von Seebach, attended by a deputation of the Ducal Ministers, was introduced. The Minister then read an address to the Prince of Coburg, in which the rights and duties granted to and imposed upon his Royal Highness consequent upon his attaining his majority, and also referring to the Prince's recent congratulations at the State Ministry upon the occasion. After the address the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Prince Alfred, with the Ministers, entered the Throne-room, and a grand dinner was held.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge has left Gloucester House for a tour in Germany.

Prince and Princess Gagarini have left Maurigy's Hotel for St. Leonards.

The Duke of Sutherland has left Trentham to join his yacht, in order to go for Cowes and thence to Dunrobin. The Duchess has left Trentham for Scotland.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter and Lady Victoria Cecil have left their residence in Grosvenor-square for Gennany.

Marquis and Marchioness Cholmondeley have left town for their shooting-box in Scotland.

The Marchioness of Huntly and family have arrived at Aboyne Castle, for the shooting season, from Scotstoun House.

Marquis Conyngham has left town for Slane Castle, in the county of Meath, Ireland.

The Earl and Countess of Coventry have arrived at Thomas's Hotel, Berkeley-square, from Norway.

The Countess (Dowager) of Jersey has left town for Osterley Park, near Brentford.

The Earl of Dudley has left Dudley House, Park-lane, for his shooting quarters in Scotland.

The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres has left town for Haigh Hall, Wigan.

Lord and Lady Otho Fitzgerald left town, on Saturday last, on a visit to the Duke of Leinster, at Carton House, Ireland.

Lord Henry Bentinck has arrived at his shooting-box in Scotland for the season.

Sir George Grey left town, on Saturday last, for Falloden, Northumberland.

Earl Cowper is gazetted a Knight of the Garter, the form of ceremony of installation being dispensed with.

The portrait of Lieutenant-General Sir William Mansfield, Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Army, which we published on the 13th of May, was from a photograph taken by Captain H. F. Christie, Aide-de-Camp to his Excellency; the negative having been sent to England, it was printed off by Mr. Herring, of Regent-street, to whom we ascribed it in our notice accompanying the Engraving.

Professor Carnllari is excavating in Sicily, and it is said that he has brought to light several relics—amongst others a number of portions of columns of the Temple of Castor and Pollux at Girgenti, a plan of the temple itself exist in the rock, two columns which formed part of the northern peristyle of the Temple of Jupiter, and the steps of the Temple of Hercules in perfect preservation, besides a large portion of the ruins of the catabisture.

OUR COLOURED ILLUSTRATION.

THE DUBLIN INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

The large colour-printed Picture given with this Number of our Journal presents a View of the Interior of the Industrial Exhibition at Dublin; while the subjects of most of the Engravings in our Supplement are chosen from the Fine-Arts Department of the Exhibition. An exterior View of the whole group of the Exhibition buildings, showing their east front as seen from Earlsfort-terrace, was published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of May 13; and in the Number for March 18 was a View taken from the pleasure-ground or garden on the other side, showing the Royal Palace, designed for a permanent conservatory or winter-garden, which is now occupied by the Exhibition. It is the interior of this Palace which is now displayed in our Coloured Illustration. We have no former occasions described this light and beautiful structure. It is composed of iron and glass, about one fourth the size of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham—being 200ft. long and central portion 447 ft. long and 84 ft. wide; the north portion 270 ft. long and 126 ft. wide, with a semicircular transept looking into the pleasure-ground, and an internal gallery, 12ft. wide, which runs all round the building. The architect was Mr. A. G. Jones, of Dublin; the engineers, Messrs. Ordish and Le Feuvre, of Westminster; the general contractors, Messrs. Beardwood and Sons, of Dublin; and the contractors for brickwork, Messrs. Rankin, of Liverpool. Neither the sculpture-gallery nor the foreign pictures gallery will be contained in the entrance-hall towards the east front, nor the British picture-gallery (which occupies the smaller concert-room adjoining the entrance-hall), come under the Royal Commission; but the Colonial Court, for which we gave an Engraving of the Sculpture-hall in the Number for May 20, to which we may also refer for a view of the scene displayed in the central part of the Industrial Section building round the dome, where the opening ceremony was performed by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The point from which we obtain the view comprised in the Coloured Picture of this day is at the end of the transept in the British department, at the junction of the transept with the south portion of the nave, having the stalls of Staffordshire pottery on the left hand, with that of the Belleek Manufacturing Company (from whose productions we have engraved several of the statues and other works of art); while on the left hand are seen the stalls of the Irish woollen and linen manufacturers, the makers of surgical and mathematical instruments, and a few others of no less importance. The band of the 78th Highlanders is playing as a little distance back, and their music mingles with the gay dresses of the ladies and the variety of flags and banners, compose a brilliant and diversified scene. The general style of decoration of Mr. Doyle has applied to the building has a very good effect, though he has relied much on greys and other atmospheric tints, with a very sparing introduction of primitive colours. The taste, skill, and judgment which has been shown in grouping and arranging the contents of the Exhibition deserve the highest praise. We have mentioned, in particular, the services of Mr. Henry Robinson, the secretary and comptroller; of Lord Southwell, Mr. H. E. Doyle, and Mr. Mulvany, who jointly arranged the fine-arts department; and we must not omit to mention the assistance rendered by Mr. T. P. Ledlie, the general superintendent and also the special superintendents of the foreign department; as well as by Mr. P. L. Simmonds the technical superintendent. The whole management of the Exhibition has been worthy of the fine and liberal conception of its authors and promoters. We hope it will prove a great commercial success.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has left Addington Park for the Continent, intending to return for the autumn session.

The Cathedral, in near Boroughbridge, was reopened, on Saturday week, after a thorough restoration by Mr. Salvin, architect.

The Ven. George Wilkinson, Archdeacon of Durham, Prebendary elect, at the residence house, Southwell, on Sunday, aged eighty.

The Archbishop of York has postponed his ordination, an extension until the end of Sunday, Dec. 11, to Sunday, Jan. 22. The Lord Bishop of Bangor has appointed his ordination for Sunday next, Aug. 20.

Gunnersbury Church, near Willesden Junction, was on Thursday week, after a restoration brought about chiefly by the exertions of the Rev. C. Wolley, Vicar.

The South Shropshire Choral Union held its second general festival at Bromfield, on the 3rd inst., in the grounds of the Rev. J. Purton, the parishes contributed a choir of 220 voices. There were also forty surpliced choristers present.

The old church of Great Holland, Essex, with the exception of the tower, has been taken down, and the whole of the materials used for the fine yesterday week by the Rector, the Rev. Richard Jaynes, in the presence of the parishioners and workmen from the neighbouring parishes.

Northam Church, Devon, was reopened on Thursday week. The window on all save, including one at the west end of the chancel, placed there by Major Stevenson, of Bideford, in memory of his parents. The Lord and Lady Clinton, by an affectionate husband and sister, in memory of Margaret Mary, who died 24th April, 1862.

The Protestant Church of Constance is preparing to erect a monumental cenotaph to the great Reformer, John Huss, who perished at the stake who was a hundred years before Luther, condemned and burnt in that city. The church is to be erected outside the city, on the spot where the pile was placed where he was burnt.

The old Norman church of Stoke Courcy, Somerset, was reopened, on Tuesday week, after having been closed two years for restoration. The cost of the work, which is from the designs of Mr. F. Bligh Bond, architect (F.R.I.B.A.), the Rev. J. Barrowell, the Vicar, £100; the Society of Merchant Venturers, on Dean Close Foundation, £200; and Mr. Bond, the architect, £100; with £1 a shilling, by Mr. J. Acland and Lady Rose, in memory of Lady Acland, and was opened by Lady Rose.

The schools belonging to the church of St. Philip's district, Bethnal-green, opened by the Bishop of Rochester, on the site of the old ones in Cranbrook. The number was about 1000, though all under eight years of age were left out. The cost of the schools, of the Gothic style, was £6000, exclusive of the site. Those schools are mainly supported by interested persons in the district, but the Bishop of Rochester, Lord Rothschild, and Mr. Barnett, being, for the most part, very poor.

The Rev. Joseph McCormick, chaplain at Zermatt, announces that an appeal has been made to the English visitors there to erect a church as a memorial to Mr. Cox, Miss Hudson, Lord F. Douglas, Mr. Hudson, and Mr. Knyvett Wilson, and that the following subscriptions have been received for the purpose: Mr. Cox, £100; Miss Hudson, £100; Lord F. Douglas, £100; Mr. Julius Zeltner, £100; from others various amounts. The church is to accommodate 200 persons, and can be built for £2 10s. a sitting.

On the 27th ult. the Church of St. Margaret, Thorne, near Doncaster, Yorkshire, has recently been restored and reopened by the Bishop of Beverley. The cost is about £600. The largest single donor is Mr. Thomas Ellis, of Thorne, who contributed £200 towards the restoration, including the porch, west window, stone-altar, and service books. The Rev. G. L. Cole contributed £100, of which the lectern, a pair of very beautiful altar candlesticks, and an alms-dish form a part. The Rev. W. S. Thomas and his personal friends gave £80.

The new Church of St. Luke, Weaste, built on a site given by Sir R. G. Booth, was consecrated on Saturday week by the Bishop of Manchester. The church is from the designs of Mr. Sharp, and is in the Decorated style, measuring internally 120 by 60 ft. The cost is £11,000, and among the gifts is a Caen stone font with the inscription:—"Presented by the friends and relations of James Harry Carter, M.A., and Eleanor his wife, A.D. 18 S.S." The parishioners contributed £1000; another gave two acres of land for the church, parsonage, and grounds, besides £1000; and a third, £1000.

On the 26th ult. the new church at Blaxgorth, Darlington-district, was consecrated after re-building. The church was built by the energy of the Rector, the Rev. D. W. Herbert, kindly aided by the parishioners and a grant from the Incorporated Church Building Society, whereby all the seats are free and unappropriated. The east window, of three lights, is filled with painted cathedral glass, by Lavers and Barraud, the gift of Mrs. Pritchard, of Tillyrnd. The altar-cloth and all chancel fittings were gifts from Miss Jones Parry; and the font, that of Mrs. Herbert.

The following preferments and appointments have recently taken place:—The Rev. T. Roberts to be Rector of Thornhill, Glamorganshire. The Rev. J. F. Hill to be Vicar of Widehead and Incumbent of Christ Church, Widehead. The Rev. A. L. Herring to be Incumbent of the new district of St. Paul's, Clerkenwell; Rev. S. Letts to be Incumbent of Collingwood, diocese of Durham. The Rev. H. Wilson to be Vicar of Bishopwearmouth, Co. Toronto. Rev. G. B. Bennett to be Perpetual Curate of Seeley, Carlisle. Rev. H. D. Moore to be Curate of St. Michael and All Angels', Bournemouth.

A meeting of the Salisbury Cathedral Restoration Committee was held at the Council-house, Salisbury, on Thursday, under the presidency of the architect, Mr. Gilbert Scott, in consort with Mr. Shields, the civil engineer, for receiving the results of the main piers in the north side of the central tower of the tower. The plans were unanimously approved, and will be carried into execution at once. It was also decided to proceed with the restoration of the restoration of the west front. As regards the works now in progress, it was reported that the masonry of the south-west pier of the central tower is in a very forward state, and that, if the weather be favourable, the whole of the works should be completed by the end of October or the first week in November. The subscriptions now in hot shortly. Recently, however, the Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. Wordsworth) has subscribed £50 guineas.

The Rev. Dr. W. Jacobson, who has been nominated to the Bishopric of Chichester, was born in London in 1803, and is the son of Mr. Graham, and clerked by the dean and chapter, in accordance with her Majesty's congé d'élire, in the presence of the Archbishop of York, by York Minster, on Thursday, the 21th inst., being St. Bartholomew's Day. The diocese of Chichester, by the Act of 1877, includes the whole county of Sussex, and the Archdeaconry of Surrey, and the Archdeaconry of Lewes, and the Archdeaconry of Chichester

"ON THE ROAD TO JERUSALEM," BY ADOLPHE SCHREYER, FROM THE LATE EXHIBITION OF THE WORKS OF FRENCH AND FLEMISH ARTISTS.

M. Schreyer, the painter of the picture we engrave from the Frene's Gallery, Pall-Mall, through little known in this country, received a first class medal for his work in the Paris Salon of 1864. His style, or rather his handling, unlike that of French painters generally, is singularly light, facile, and sketchy. Notwithstanding, it is but little less accurately descriptive, and, as might be expected from a close observer and clever artist, is highly suggestive. The example we engrave has the virtue of a study painted "on the spot," and, of course, as a local transcript, possesses corresponding value. We feel that we have here a truthful representation of one of that very remarkable race, the Syrian Bedouins, who occasionally visit Jerusalem for business or devotion—an Arab of the Arabs—a Jerusalem (a sheikh, probably) of one of those pure and jealously exclusive tribes who, it is not unreasonable to suppose, are direct descendants from Esau—a man, who (as his scymitar, matchlock, and pistols remind us—though he and his fellows may sometimes find it to their interest to guard travellers or a caravanserai), is general, fulfils the prophecy that "his hand shall be against every man and every man's hand against him." In conformity to the custom—and, indeed, necessity—on these scorching and now arid and desolate plains, which could hardly be traversed at all without wells from station to station, he tries to keep himself cool under heaps of garments—keffyeh, bournous, rumbaz, scarves, and shawls. But underneath that shapeless pile is a form, small indeed, but symmetrical, strong, lithe, sinewy, and capable of immense endurance, with muscles of iron and bones of a texture finer than ivory; a physique, in short, closely resembling the wonderful breed of horses, of which he rides, and which we know by the name of his master's race, though the horse, for faithfulness and docility, deserves a better designation.

FINE ARTS.

THE RAPHAEL ROOM AT THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

THE recent removal—with the consent of her Majesty—of the Raphael cartoons from Hampton Court Palace to the South Kensington Museum is an event of too much interest to be passed over with a simple announcement. Not only are the cartoons rendered more accessible to the general public by this removal, but, for the first time, they are so disposed as to be fairly visible. The gallery at Hampton Court, which William III. constructed for them to build expressly for the reception of these the most famous art-treasures of this country, is, perhaps, the worst lighted every designed by a great architect for the exhibition of pictures. The light fell full in front on five of the cartoons; moreover, the principal amount of light struck them instead of the upper part of the compositions; whilst the cartoon hanging at each extremity of the gallery was in the shade, where the finest qualities of the gallery were in shade, where the finest qualities of Raphael's genius, illustrated by this incomplete, full-sized copies of the arabesque pilasters which decorate the loggia of the Vatican, have been placed between the cartoons; and, owing to the glass sloping scarce from which the curve of roof springs, are hung copies of the cycle of Scripture events represented in the loggia of the Vatican, and commonly called "Raphael's Bible." Between the "Paul Preaching at Athens" and "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes" hangs the meritorious copy in black chalk, made by Casanova, in 1769, from Raphael's last great work, "The Transfiguration," in the Vatican. Opposite "Christ's Charge to Peter" is an old Mortlake tapestry copy of the same, which is now in the Spanish royal and private gallery, the precious piece of Gobelins tapestry, a copy of the Holy Family in the Louvre, popularly known as the Holy Family of Francis the First, which was engraved on a large scale in 1862, for the South Kensington Museum, by Napoleon III. The Mortlake tapestry would, however, bear no comparison with the one in the Louvre, though these are in a wretchedly faded and injured condition. There are also in a room a few photographs and water-colour copies of works in terra-cotta of the statues by Raphael of Jonah in the Chigi Chapel of Santa Maria del Popolo, a small preliminary sketch in water-colour for one of the pieces of majolica (or, as it used to be called, Raphael-ware) and a few pieces of majolica (or, as it used to be called, Raphael-ware) painted from designs by Raphael. The most important of these pieces is the engraving, and drawings from Raphael's frescoes in the Farnesina, from his oval pictures and drawings (especially the well-known and instructive study for the "Galatea") are also here, however, to be made before this "Raphael Room" will be as representative of the range and variety of the master's genius as the most successive styles as it could and should be rendered.

The cartoons of Raphael are universally acknowledged to be among the noblest and most dramatic designs of the greatest of painters. Their subjects and merits, however, are so well known and so often set forth that to say anything we could offer in regard to one or the other within our limited space would either be needlessly brief or tedious. The artist, after he had painted by Raphael and Michael Angelo, they have, of the greatest of painters by Raphael and Michael Angelo, they have, of the greatest of painters by Raphael and Michael Angelo, they have, of the greatest of painters

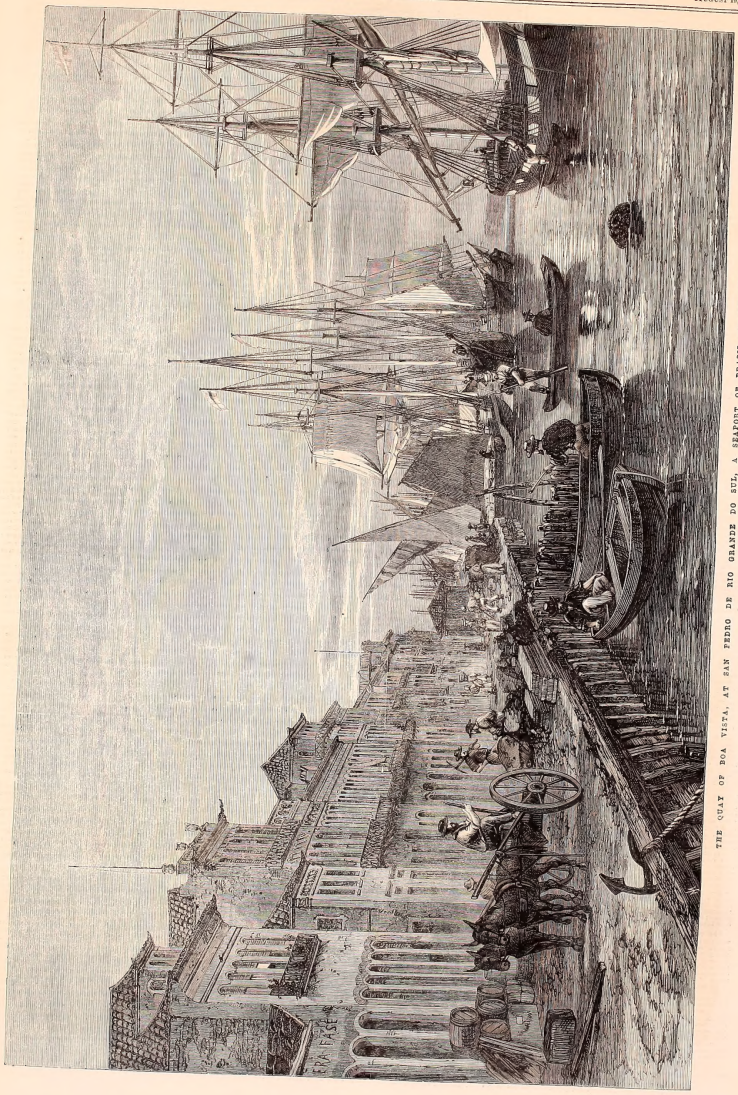
METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Marquis of Westminster has presented an additional donation of £200 to the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital.

The Duke of Cleveland's prize of £200 has been awarded to Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson, F.R.C.S., of Finsbury-circus, by the physicians and surgeons of Guy's Hospital, for his essay on "Injuries of the Head and their Treatment."

On Tuesday there was the annual gathering of the members of the Foresters' Society at the Crystal Palace, and, although the day was wet and unpromising, more than 60,000 people, for the most part members of the order, flocked to the scene of the festival.

The medical staff of the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road—under the presidency of the Rt. Hon. Russell, senior physician of the institution—dined together, yesterday week, at the Brunswick Hotel, Blackwall, with the annual object of doing honour to Dr. Quain, by whose exertions the hospital was procured. Dr. Russell proposed Dr. Marsden's health in a complimentary speech.



The annual meeting upon the Thames for the purposes of counting and marking the swans belonging to her Majesty the Queen and the Vintners' and Dyers' Companies of the city of London, took place yesterday. At the marking last year there were 147 old birds and 169 cygnets. The returns for this year, down to Purfleet, however, in consequence of the forty-six swans—namely, six old birds and forty cygnets.

The newly-elected Parliament, which does not yet meet, was on Tuesday, formally prorogued by the Lord Chancellor. On ordinary occasions a Royal Commission is appointed for the purpose and the Lord Chancellor commons; but as there is now no Speaker and no members sworn, the ceremony was introduced by the Lord Chancellor and the attendance of the House alone.

Another local exhibition of art and manufactures, called the North-East London Exhibition, was opened on Wednesday at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. The opening was inaugurated by a luncheon given by the Chancellor, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Lord Mayor, and other persons of distinction who were on the platform. Lord Granville opened the exhibition to a general and sensible address. The object of the present exhibition is to exhibit for the eastern and north-eastern districts of the metropolis a display similar to the Kensington Museum in the south-west, in which shall be collected such models and designs of manufactures as shall enable the artisans of the working men—to whom it already exists—obtain it, and give it the due place in question.

The arrangements for forming a park for the south-eastern portion of the metropolis are completed, the Government having read upon a site for it, and concluded their negotiations for its purchase. The site consists of sixty-four acres of land, situated on the Surrey side of the river, and is bounded by Jamaica-road, Union-road, Rotherhithe New-road, and the South-Devon railway. The land is to be purchased at the cost of £200 per acre, and the Government will lay out the ground upon the most approved plan. The same committee of that body have received instructions for negotiating a loan of £60,000 for the purchase of the land, and the sum will be repaid in the sixty-five area only forty-five will be devoted to the purposes of the park, as the remaining twenty will be set out in building plots for the benefit of the park, so that the land will be recouped a portion of its outlay by the sale of the plots in question.

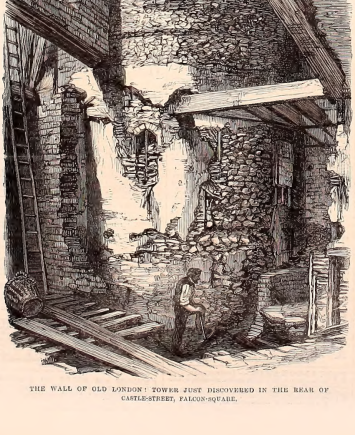
The 26th anniversary meeting of the Royal Botanic Society of London was held in the Gardens, Regent's Park, on Wednesday—Sir W. Temple Freer in the chair. The annual report read by the secretary, Mr. Sowerby, stated that the society had just completed the payment of the last receipts from all sources being above the average, and amounting to a total of £10,766. Among the subscribers through the year were 1,200 new. The payments were £8,836. The number of subscribers elected during the year was 711, showing the total number on the books at the present time to be 4,000. The three great fêtes was good, and 19,362 tickets of admission were issued for these days, being an increase over those issued last year. The number of reports had been undertaken during the year, which showed a large portion of the society's revenue. The attendance was very numerous, and the chair was taken at the usual hour

THE QUAY OF BOA VISTA, AT SAN PEDRO DE RIO GRANDE DO SUL, A SEAPORT OF BRAZIL.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

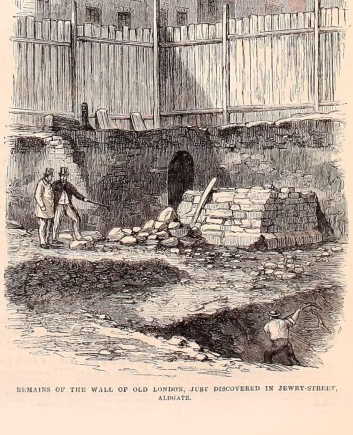
Minories (though the street trends westward), have just been unearthed the remains shown in the second Engraving, this being the fourth discovery of the wall between the Tower and Aldgate since 1841.

The site of the second find is a large space on the east side of the lower end of Jewry-street, which has recently been cleared of a number of small houses, to afford a site for the erection of some extensive additions to a lofty pile of warehouses. The remains were found at various levels. Here are masses of Roman stonework, with bondings of Roman bricks, or, as we should call them, tiles; there is a superstructure of earlier date; while in the lowest depths horns of oxen and other remains are found in abundance: indeed, the entire area presents a speculative field for the antiquarian visitor. East of the site is Vine-street, named from a vineyard anciently there, in the rear of the Minories. We were gratified in seeing some entire Roman bricks, cleared of cement, &c., fine specimens of the building materials of our conquerors.

THE TOWN AND PORT OF RIO GRANDE DO SUL.



SAN PEDRO DE RIO GRANDE DO SUL is the principal port of the south of Brazil, though not the capital of the province of that name. In some respects it is rather connected with the neighbouring Republic of the Banda Oriental or Uruguay, as it serves for an outlet for the produce of the northern districts of that Republic—hides, jerked beef, and tallow being the chief exports. The town—usually called "Rio Grande do Sul"—is situated on a long, sandy peninsula, with a shallow lagoon some seven or eight miles broad between it and the mainland; another swampy also separates it from the outer sandbank. The entrance from the ocean is to the north of the city, through a break in the sandbank, over a dangerous bar, which, with some winds, is impassable. There is also a small village and quay to the north of the entrance half buried in sand, from which a great part of the produce is actually put on board the larger vessels. The streets are dirty and unpaved; sand, hot and burning, is everywhere. The houses, which at a distance look so picturesque, will not bear a closer inspection; and the first feeling of a stranger on arriving there is the consideration of leaving it by the first possible opportunity. The principal quay—the Rua da Boa Vista—of which we have engraved a view from a sketch by Mr. David Fowell, runs along the inner lagoon, but small vessels only can lie alongside. Here are the houses of the principal merchants, that in the foreground belonging to Messrs. J. Proudfoot and Sons, the first English house in the city. This place has lately acquired a special interest on account of the war between Brazil and Paraguay, which threatens to bring an invading force of Paraguayans into the province. The capital of the province is Porto Alegre, situated higher up the lagoon; and communication with it is kept up by small steamers, which accomplish the voyage in about two days. The latest advices from Rio Janeiro to the 9th ult. state that the Emperor was to leave that day for Rio Grande do Sul, after prorogning the Chambers until next May.



THE LATE PROFESSOR AYTOUN, OF EDINBURGH.

THE LATE PROFESSOR AYTOUN.

THE funeral of the late Professor Aytoun, whose death was noticed in our last, took place in the Dean Cemetery, at Edinburgh, on Friday week. His grave is close to that of his father-in-law, Professor Wilson, and some of the Edinburgh scholars and literary men attended the ceremony of his interment. The chief dates and circumstances of his career, and the titles of some of his best writings, have already been mentioned. He was one of the last of a distinguished band of Scottish litterateurs who are either dying out or becoming absorbed in a wider field. To the magazine-literature of Scotland Professor Aytoun had for about thirty years been a constant contributor, and nearly all his writings first saw the light in the pages of the monthlies. The frequency of his contributions, and their generally brilliant and always genial character, for some years rendered Aytoun's the best-known name, after Wilson's, in connection with Blackwood's Magazine, though at no time did he act as editor or take any share in the management of the magazine beyond that which his position as a valued contributor of necessity gave him. The belief that he was editor has been for many years very general; but we are assured that this belief was erroneous. In his professorship of rhetoric, Mr. Aytoun succeeded as well as perhaps any professor of that subject would care to succeed. "He was," says an Edinburgh writer, "liked by his students; and the doctrine and discipline of his class were not so rigorous as to make it unattractive to many youths who would never have taken to literature as a severe study. He did not care to grapple with the philosophy of his subject—a task in which certainly only a small minority of his students would have followed him. But he wooed to the love and the use of literature, by showing its pleasures and its beauties; and, delighting in these himself, he kindled an enthusiasm in his students which, though a good deal from without, inwards was still not without its fruits. A man who aimed higher might not have succeeded better." The Portrait engraved is from a photograph by Mr. T. Rodgers, of St. Andrew's.

REMAINS OF THE WALL OF OLD LONDON, JUST DISCOVERED IN JEWRY-STREET, ALDGATE.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Aug. 14).—To-day's market was but moderately supplied with English wheat, but of inferior sort. The demand, owing to the changeable state of the weather for harvest work, ruled steady, at 1s. to 2s. per quarter above the rates current on Monday last. The show of foreign wheat was small, and the trade was dull at more money. Both English and foreign barley was in fair request, and the turn higher. The malt trade was firm, at extreme rates. Oats were in good supply, and the demand for them was dull, at quarter over money. Beans and peas were quite as fast as last week. Flour inclined to be, 1s. per 280 lb.

ENGLISH AVERAGES.—The following are the mean heads of grain delivered and thrashed in the week last returned:—

English—Wheat, 44s. 4d.; barley, 26s. 1d.; oats, 18s.; rye, 34s.; peas, 31s.; beans, 31s. 10d.; Indian corn, 28s.; flour, 39s. 6d.; per 280 lbs. 4s. per quarter; duty, 2s. 6d.

Scotch—Wheat, 36s. 8d.; barley, 22s. 8d.; oats, 16s.; rye, 34s.; beans, 32s.; peas, 32s.; flour, 32s. 6d.; per 280 lbs.

Irish—Wheat, 36s. 8d.; barley, 22s. 8d.; oats, 16s.; rye, 34s.; beans, 32s.; peas, 32s.; flour, 32s. 6d.; per 280 lbs.

Foreign—Wheat, 44s. 4d.; barley, 26s. 1d.; oats, 18s.; rye, 34s.; beans, 31s. 10d.; peas, 31s.; flour, 39s. 6d.; per 280 lbs. 4s. per quarter; duty, 2s. 6d.

Seconds—Wheat, 44s. 4d.; barley, 26s. 1d.; oats, 18s.; rye, 34s.; beans, 31s. 10d.; peas, 31s.; flour, 39s. 6d.; per 280 lbs. 4s. per quarter; duty, 2s. 6d.

Flour—The prices of town-made flour remain at late rates. Essex, Suffolk, and Kent sacks about stationary. Norfolk and Irish, 40s. to 44s. per barrel; Stoned, crushing, 44s. to 48s. per 280 lbs. Foreign, 36s. to 40s. per barrel; Stoned, 40s. to 44s. per 280 lbs. Seconds, 32s. to 36s. per barrel; Stoned, 36s. to 40s. per 280 lbs.

Bread—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6½d. to 7d.; of household, 5d. to 6d.; per 4lb. loaf.

Imported Weekly Average—Wheat, 42s. 6d.; barley, 26s. 10d.; oats, 18s. 2d.; rye, 34s.; peas, 31s.

English Gazette Average—Wheat, 44s. 4d.; barley, 26s. 1d.; oats, 18s.; rye, 34s.; peas, 31s.

Wheat—Owing to the limited business doing in this market, and prices are with difficulty quoted.

Sugar—The demand for all raw qualities continues in a sluggish state, and the turn in favour of the buyer. Grocery descriptions, 34s. to 34s. 6d.; refining, 33s. to 33s. 6d.; bastard, 32s. to 32s. 6d.; per cwt. Foreign, 32s. to 33s.; per cwt.

Provisions—Irish butter is in moderate demand for home consumption, and the quotations have an upward tendency. Bacon moves off slowly, at late prices. Hams and lard are dull, at 2s. per cwt. less money. Irish and foreign are nominal. Other provisions are firm in price.

Coals—Hartwell, 20s.; Hetton, 20s.; Hutton Seaton, 19s.; Kelloe, 20s. 3d.; Lambton, 20s.; Lord Wynyard, 20s.; per ton.

Tallow—Considerable business having come to hand from the Continent, the market for all kinds of tallow is dull, and prices have a downward tendency.

Potatoes—The supplies are large, and the demand is steady, at late rates. Kent Regents, 70s.

Metropolitan Cattle Market (Thursday, Aug. 17).—Our cattle trade was rather scantily supplied with beasts, both as to number and quality, on Monday last; and the sale for the best Scots and runts was slow, the best Scots near barely at late rates. A few very prime beasts realised 4s. 6d. per 8lb. Several head, suffering from disease, were exposed for sale in Smithfield. The supply of sheep was tolerably moderate. The mutton trade was slow; nevertheless, prices were fully supported. The best Downs and other prime sheep sold at 4s. 8d. per 8lb. Lambs were pretty steady to hand, and the demand was rather less than inactive, at from 5s. to 5s. 8d. per 8lb. Calves moved off heavily, at from 4s. 6d. to 5s. per 8lb. Pigs, 4s. to 4s. 2d. per 8lb., and in fair request, but scarcely firm in price.

Per 8 lb. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 4d. to 3s. 6d.; second quality ditto, 3s. 8d. to 3s. 10d.; prime large oxen, 4s. 0d. to 4s. 2d.; prime Scots, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 4d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s. 8d. to 4s.; second quality ditto, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 4d.; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s. 6d. to 4s. 8d.; prime Southdown ditto, 4s. 6d. to 4s. 8d.; large oxen calves, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 4d.; prime small ditto, 4s. 6d. to 4s. 8d.; large coarse calves, 4s. 0d. to 4s. 2d.; prime Scots, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 6d.; lambs, 5s. 0d. to 5s. 8d.; and quarter-old store pigs, 23s. to 29s. each.

Total supply last week:—Beasts, 140; sheep and lambs, 1,600; calves, 650; pigs, 300. Foreign: Beasts, 180; sheep and lambs, 1,200; pigs, 200.

Advertisements.—Only twopence a word, or a shilling a line, for an effective sale. Sales, however, generous sheep, are not to be had.

THE FAMILY HERALD. Complete Sets for Sale.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—All the Back Numbers are in print, and may be had by order of any Bookseller.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Registered for Transmission Abroad.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Saturday Review: "The Family Herald' stands on the head, both in age and popularity, of all the penny serials."

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Illustrated London News: "The Family Herald' has by far the largest circulation of any Sunday paper."

THE FAMILY HERALD.—British Quarterly Review: "The 'Family Herald' is well considered with reference to the class it aims to benefit and advising with a fair amount of utility interested. Of all these publications, we consider it the best conducted."

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Leigh Hunt's Journal: "The 'Family Herald,' a penny publication qualified to inform the heads of the people."

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Bookseller:—"For amusing reading, such as may be admitted to each household, the 'Family Herald' is unrivalled. Its contributors are numerous, and their articles, if not always of a high order of excellence, read, two or three periodicals, a set of useful information on subjects connected with the arts, sciences, and manufactures, which will make readers either merrier or wiser, or perhaps both."

THE FAMILY HERALD. — Literary Gazette: "The 'Family Herald' has the merit to be the purest reading of all purely amusing literature; it is, indeed, a first-rate publication."

THE FAMILY HERALD. — Leading and Scholastic Journal: "The 'Family Herald' stands at the very pattern of cheap journalism."—Saturday Review. "There is a large amount of information, and that of a useful kind, in every number. The 'Family Herald' is a publication of which we cannot speak too favourably."—Literary Gazette. "The leading articles show matter of no ordinary kind, and the 'Family Herald' is a publication which, for its moderate price, is worthy of the support of the middle classes."—Illustrated Journal. "Solid and excellent essays are to be found in every number of the 'Family Herald.' The tales are, for the most part, well written, and either exhibit greater research and closeness than we look for in works of this class, or are entirely free from the blemishes."—The leading articles in the 'Family Herald' are generally excellent."—Illustrated London News.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Novels and Tales:—"As novels and tales are quite as valuable as the more serious articles, we must not omit to say that the 'Family Herald' is the home of the Novel. We have seen the most meritorious and interesting tales in the 'Family Herald.' Many of the most popular novels of the day have appeared in the 'Family Herald' before they were published in volumes."—Gentleman's Journal. "It is highly natural as a literary production, and is conducted with much ability."—Sun. "The 'Family Herald' is the best of the cheap publications. Its leading essays and literary in the kingdom."—Plymouth Herald. "The novels and tales which appear in this work rival, and surpass, and are good in purpose."—Leeds Herald.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Answers to Correspondents:—"The editor is the smallest and severest critic in the world. The Answers to Correspondents cannot be fictitious, a scrapper and a life history being embodied in the answers. The 'Family Herald' is a publication which is in good faith, and respectable in its character. On two points we could very favourably advise publishers and others more interested."—Bell's Life in London. "The Answers to Correspondents are numerous, and of a very miscellaneous character, ranging from questions of the most trifling nature to those of the most serious importance. The answers to correspondents are generally judicious, and the information which they contain, and the answers to correspondents afford its height to the operations of the Family Herald' must be considered extensive."—Manchester Examiner.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Poetry:—"There are elsewhere verses but little to praise, like wreaths, to be found in the 'Family Herald,' which, if not of the highest order of poetry, are unexceptionable, and we find a really clever composition is marked over this very interesting department of the publication."—Sun.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Random Readings:—"An anthology of very honest, most judiciously selected extracts, in prose and verse, from the best authors, ancient and modern, English and foreign, is the 'Family Herald's' Random Readings are rich in wit, sensibility, and humour."—Illustrated London News. "The Random Readings' are chiefly selected and abridged from the best and pleasantest, as also most with the money."—Wits Standard.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—Family Matters, Hints to Mothers:—"A host of recipes and suggestions to household matters, excellent in their way, is given week by week."—Illustrated London News. "The Family Matters' contain a variety of valuable, and very useful hints."—Manchester Examiner. "Household Hints:—"Are family purposes no other magazine can be found to equal the 'Family Herald.'"—Sheffield Times. "The Family Matters' contain a variety of valuable hints."—Stereoscopic Chronicle. "Every phase of domestic and social life receives thoughtful and sensible treatment."—Bell's Life.

THE FAMILY HERALD.—The Riddler. "A host of amusement is afforded to the home circle in the 'Family Herald' by the ingenious riddles, charades, and enigmas."—Illustrated London News. "The Riddler' contains a host of acrostics and memorable questions, while the more practical and scientific readers will find a variety of useful and valuable information in the 'Family Herald' on the subject of medicine, which are given in extenso."—Cambridge Chronicle.

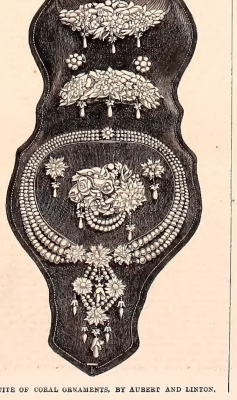
THE DUBLIN INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

"SLEEPING FAUN AND SATYR."

THE group we have engraved, and the "Sarl," by Mr. Story, are decidedly the two chefs-d'œuvre of the sculpture in the Dublin Exhibition. Miss Hosmer's group surpasses everything by its gifted author we had previously seen, and for truthful modelling of the human form, controlled by a fine feeling for grace derived from study of the antique, there is, we think, nothing in the exhibition quite equal to it. It need not be said, for it is quite evident in all she does that this gifted American lady has, like her master at Rome, our own English sculptor, Gibson, and like Fitzman, Thorwaldsen, Canova, and every modern sculptor who has distinguished himself, not only studied nature but also the great masterpieces of antiquity. The original "motif" for this faun is probably traceable to the famous antique, without legs, and only one arm (thrown over the head), sleeping in a somewhat similar attitude, known as the Barberini Faun, and now at Munich. But Miss Hosmer's faun is a younger member of the Satyr clan, less coarse in character and less inebriate. It is not a savage, but a comparatively graceful and refined impersonation of sylvan nature; one of the fauns of Arcady, a pupil of Pan, as we see by the pandean pipes; and a follower of Dionysus, as we may infer from the panther-skin and the grapes—emblems of the rich fecundity and intoxicating power of nature, and the juice of which has contributed to his deep slumber. The introduction of the infant Satyr is a pretty fancy, and the little playful half-man, half-goat, is suitably engaged in the mischievous trick of fastening the sleeper to his seat by tying together a paw and the tail of his panther-skin.

"SLEEPING FAUN AND SATYR," MARBLE GROUP, BY MISS HARRIET HOSMER.



This group proves beyond a doubt the advantage of referring to classical sculpture in plastic representations of the human figure. The Greek sculptor (as pointed out by Sir Charles Bell) had, unquestionably, opportunities of studying the nude such as no modern artist can enjoy. This choice of subject, however, will be objected to by those who would—thoughtlessly, in our opinion—deny to the modern sculptor all classical themes. Surely the poetic imagination which pervades, and the human passions which vivify, the Greek mythology and literature will never lose their significance and interest. Is it not probable, even, that the polished and philosophic Athenian regarded much of his Pantheon as purely symbolic, and much as it is regarded by the educated Englishman? Let us have modern subjects by all means; but what modern subjects will enable the sculptor to achieve the greatest and most legitimate triumph of his art—the rendering of the naked majesty of the human form? If this triumph be achieved, the pleasure it will afford will be very slightly modified whether we call the result "A Faun," or a "Youth asleep," or "at a Stream," a "Venus," an "Eve," or a "Pose Plastique;" only that an abstract, not too familiar but poetical, theme is far better suited for the cold, white, chaste material than those commonplace, homely, vulgar subjects which always seem impertinences when done into marble. Following the practice of Mr. Gibson, Miss Hosmer has slightly tinted the figures in this work. There is no longer a doubt that the Greeks toned (by the encaustic process), and even painted their statues. To express the dark skins of the satyr race, they appear also to have used tinted marble and stone. There is in the capitol at Rome a very celebrated faun in rosso antico.

BRONZE FIGURE, BY MIROY BROTHERS.

PAIR OF BRONZES-D'ART.

THIS pair of bronze groups, which for want of a better title we have called "Bronzes-d'Art,"—a term that has come into frequent use since the importation of so many French bronzes into this country—are among the best examples of that art in the Exhibition. The Italian style in character and costume is as perfectly reproduced in them as is the early Flemish in the figures over the timepiece engraved on another page. In design and modelling they are most correct and elegant; while the elaborate finish of the detail is extraordinary. And how many associations do they not call forth of the state and splendour of the quatre-cento, or early cinque-cento, when everyone seemed to breathe an atmosphere of art, and the art-element entered into every detail of life; when even tailors seem to have been artists, and men and women looked and comported themselves in their gay garments and sumptuous apparel as to the manner born—at least so did they, if we are to believe their glorious old contemporaries, the painters! Look at those two youths—though very likely of "gentle blood" and breeding, yet retainers only of some noble house, as we see by the armorial bearings embroidered on their breast, the Medici, say, for instance: look at them, we say, and think what a figure your modern Jeanes or "buttons" would cut beside them. If the mere "varlets" (as they would be called in the old, not intentionally offensive meaning of the word), hangers-on, and outsiders were such thorough-bred gentlemen and exquisites as these, frizzled their hair so elaborately, set their natty, feather-bedecked barretts or steel scull-caps so jauntily; wore their laced and embroidered jackets, and parti-coloured silk tights, puffed and slashed with such fantastic daintiness; sported belt and dagger or hunting-horn and chain so bravely, and posed themselves with such nonchalant grace against the staves of their fire-brickets—what, we say again, must have been the stately splendour of the noble cavalcade and gallant array when the Principe himself, attended by his whole suite, with scores of such fellows as these, cascoled along the Val d'Arno towards the woods of Vallombrosa to hunt the bear or chase those beasts which were deemed fair sport, and not "vermines," in the knightly mediæval code of venery!

CORAL SUITE.

THIS suite of ornamental jewellery, though it may arrest the attention of few male visitors, will be not one of the objects of least interest to the ladies, especially those who are connoisseurs of coral—that wonderful insect deposit which, we believe has of late years risen considerably in the estimation of the fair sex. It seems, however, that a somewhat arbitrary standard of beauty has been established in regard to the colour of coral. We must see more think of a choice piece of coral when we talk of "coral lips" than we must of a bigaroon when we speak of "cherry lips." Coral, to be rare and valuable, must be of a delicate pinkish hue, uniform in tint throughout, and in large pieces. This suits consists of nothing but such; and on rare is coral answering this description, that Signor Giamondi, the designer and carver of this set of ornaments, is said to have been twenty years collecting the pieces he required in them. Of the carving of the pieces into flowers and foliage we need only say that it is as delicate as it is as bold and deep, and retains the reputation of the Italians for skill in glyptics. The suit consists of tiara, bracelets, solitaires, comb, earrings, brooch, necklace, and pendant, and is valued at £1000, though it may be purchased almost alone by the coral. Messrs. Aubert and Linton, of Regent-street, are the exhibitors, and whose shop-to-clothes (also at Stobbi) proved so attractive in the International Exhibition of '67, and secured for it the post Lancashire prize medal. It is understand that the little mechanical songster has since been lent out for different charities, and has in all won by its performances at least £1000.

THE FINE ARTS AND THE ART-MANUFACTURES IN THE DUBLIN INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Our readers are probably aware that the Dublin International Exhibition "Palace" consists of two divisions—a main building, embodying a central façade; and a structure of glass and iron (to serve, on the close of the Exhibition, as a "winter garden") running parallel with them, on three sides, and having a picturesque frontage towards the new gardens in the rear. The stone building is of two stories—above and without, but the confusion of styles and some of the ornamental details are open to criticism. One excellent feature, however, is the central hall, comprising a peristyle below—in and beyond the interaccolumniation of which the sculpture is displayed—and a spacious gallery above, with open space over the ceiling of the peristyle affording sufficient room for inspecting all but the largest and highest pictures. The eastern room, the walls of which are covered with paintings, is also a very large and fine apartment. There are, besides, several well-lighted galleries parallel with them, the first of which contains as lecture-halls, reading-rooms, and offices; but now containing the paintings by the Spanish school and by the old masters, water-colour drawings, photographs, &c.

The first impression of the whole exhibition can hardly fail to be disappointing to those who have witnessed the vast international displays in London and Paris. But, after such comparisons are put aside, and upon further acquaintance, it must be deemed, notwithstanding some curious disproportions and unexpected deficiencies, a satisfactory advance upon its predecessor, and especially in the parts concerned with its organisation. The whole may be viewed with comfort; one need not enter away after inspecting a few rooms with a painful sense of having only seen a fractional part, and it will well repay a visit to Dublin. On the whole, the fine arts—painting and sculpture and some foreign schools of painting, are better represented than the industrial arts. Yet we shall commence our necessarily slight survey of the fine-art department with the ANCIENT MASTERS AND DECEASED BRITISH ARTISTS.

This gallery contains (like, we are sorry to say, the Dublin National Gallery in Merrion-square) a considerable proportion of very inferior old pictures, several of which are quite worthless rubbish. The most interesting works are by our great English masters, Hogarth and Reynolds. "The Lady's Last Stake" (53), by Hogarth, is a picture of his highest quality technically, and probably the best example to meet English visitors. It was painted in 1720, for Lord Charlemont, the ancestor of the present contributor, and "represents Lady Berry Gist" and a portrait of "Emily, Duchess of Leinster" (51), in which the latter "had expected glaciers of wonderful purity and unusually well preserved, there are two most remarkable portraits of Irish patriots which look as far as we are aware, as if they had been cut out of Ireland—viz., "Primate Robinson" (67) and "The Archbishop of Tuam" (74). Both are of the painter's best period and have great breadth and humanity, but the second in particular is quite worthy among his finest masterpieces. The admirable management of the white and black robes, the fine if subdued tone, the delicate and light background, the colour, tone, and handling, are features or qualities of rare and almost singular excellence. Each of these pictures is sent his very important series of voluptuous though rather obscure allegorical compositions, by Verspronck, Jordaens, the National Gallery; and also the ceiling-painting, by Tintoretto, into and the infant Hercules, from the creation of "The Milky Way." The latter is lished by all that master's wealth of invention and fire and force of execution. Among works from Sir Charles Eastlake's gift is a very naturalistic Spanish picture of "peasants," a very excellent example of Mnes, "Head of an Old Woman," two landscapes by Leutherburgh, and two others recently exhibited at Burlington House—a charming landscape worthy of Berghem (147), the other a head (148) resembling Vandyke in the most perfect sketching style. Of contemporary art, Lord Powerscourt "An Old Rabbi" is the best picture in the gallery bearing the name of Rembrandt. Indeed, it is one of the most highest quality. The most noteworthy Vandykes are those of Lord Powerscourt and Mr. Gustave Benedict Lane. The former, Sir Geoffrey Hudson" (32), an excellent example, though its better qualities are not obvious at a first glance; and the "Earl of Newport" (39). The striking "Portrait of a Monk" (105), from the same collection, is, doubtless, a genuine work of Titian: it is far more probable that Vandyke was the painter. Lord Charlemont's Titian is, we think incorrectly, said to be Cæsar Borgia" (41) Lucrezia had been not four Hadrian's daughter. A description of the authenticated portrait. Several of the choicest pictures in the gallery belong to Mr. Gustave Benedict Lane, and others, Rubens's rough but most masterly portrait of the "Earl of Arundel" (14), a "Portrait" (119), by Moreelse, "Portrait of a Lady" scene" (8), by Teniers; and the "Duke of Ferrara" (124), by Dosso Dossi. All these pictures have been exhibited in Burlington House before, we need not review them anew. Sir Wentworth Dilke has sent a decapitated head, attributed to Canwaggio, but we should like to know upon what authority it is entitled "Head of the Cenci" (111). Making every allowance for the foreshortening, this heavy, ill-favoured, classical type of head bears no resemblance to the Cenci's well-known portrait, by Guido, in the Barberini Palace. We remember also an unusually fine work by Seghers, "Christ Appearing to Mary Magdalen" (71), very interesting in other respects, from its vivid colour, ascribed to Scarsellino da Ferrara, "Christ Led to Execution" (92); "The Apotheosis of St. Francis" (117), by Canwaggio; the "Holy Family" (118), by Sasso Ferrato, an example of extraordinary character; and several works of interest, chiefly as regards the archæology of art, we shall have named the most important works in this gallery.

BRITISH SCHOOL.

We regret to find that very few English artists have contributed, on their own account, to this exhibition. Doubtless they have a good market nearer home; but, we think, they have hardly consulted their reputation in forgetting the claims of the sister country. The great mass of the noticeable pictures are selections from the Royal collection, from South Kensington, the "diploma" pictures of the Royal Academy, and private collections of works already exhibited. To those who have to make acquaintance with these works they will, of course, afford the same pleasure as they have already given to persons familiar with them; and it is agreeable and instructive merely to have an opportunity for verifying former impressions by seeing the pictures again under different circumstances and in a fresh collection; but, as they are known to a large proportion of our readers, and have many of them been already reviewed in these columns, the present contents will be a simple enumeration of the most remarkable of the number.

Her Majesty then, has graciously contributed, among others, the undermentioned works:—"The Penny Wedding" and "The Maid of Dunsgreen," by Sir David Wilkie; "Portrait of Lady Ely," by Sir Joshua; "The Coronation of Queen Victoria: Receiving the Sacrament," by Leslie; "The Wind and the Lady," and a "Portrait of Lady Mulready;" "The Marriage of the Princess Royal," by Phillip; "Portrait of Lady Lyndhurst," by Sir T. Lawrence; "Portrait of Lady Audley," by Sir Thomas Lawrence; "Portrait of Lady Audley," by Sir Thomas Lawrence; "The Distribution of the Crimean Medals," by G. H. Thomas; and the "Queen's Gift of Exhibition of 1851," by Sir Edwin Landseer. The National Gallery (British school), and the Sheepshanks and other donations at South Kensington, have contributed the following artists:—Sir Edwin Landseer, "The Shepherd's Chief Mourner" ; Leslie, "Uncle Toby and Widow Wadman;" Cope, "Sancho Panza and the Duchess;" Mulready, "The Last In" and "First Love;" Elmore; Maclise, "Malvolio and the Countess"—these works are by the late Sir Edwin and regarded as the masterpieces of Irish artists; W. Collins, "As Happy as a King;" Turner, "Venice;" H. Ward, "The Duke of Wellington at the Battle of Lord Chesterfield;" Wilkie, "The Parish Beadle;" Herbert, "Sir Thomas More and his Family;" Frith, "The Village Festival;" and several "diploma pictures," and the collection of portraits of Royal Academicians in course of presentation to the National Gallery, "A Ferager," Maclise; portrait of Gibson the Sculptor, Boxall; portrait of Sir Charles Eastlake, Knight; "Song of the Solent Shaw," F. Goodall, which we engraved not long since; "The Village Reflexes," Redgrave; "Oliver Cromwell Praying," Ward; Sir John Macnee's Portrait of the late D. Roberts; and specimens of F. R. Pickersgill, C. R. Cooke, Roberts, and Goodall. Among the many celebrated pictures which had previously been exhibited in Trafalgar-square, or elsewhere, of which we may name O'Neil's shipwreck scene, "Eastward Ho!" Frith's "Railway Station," the "Funeral of John Hampden," by Calderon; "The Vale of Rest," by Millais; "Peace Concluded," by Orchardson; "Mariana in Antiquis Marys," by E. Armitage; "Fête de Marriage," by F. Goodall; "The Parting of Sir Lancelot and Lady Elaine," by E. Normoy; and an oil, of the fresco in the Westminster Palace; Watts's portrait of Sir John Gorst, and "Sir Galahad," and a large piece of tree-ment out of the ordinary rots of professional portraiture. Lastly, there are several works by Mr. Orchardson, which have a special reputation, one of which we may mention particularly—i.e., an imaginative representation, by E. Saiel, of "The Angel of Interpretation" in the Book of Daniel, which presents a most beautiful subjects in the same frame, showing the crimes and sorrows for which the Angel interprets the vision to the prophet. We should add that M. Desanges's "Victoria Cross Gallery," numbering upwards of fifty pictures, occupies one of the principal rooms.

THE FOREIGN SCHOOLS.

Nothing relating to this exhibition is more surprising than the curiously disproportionate manner in which the foreign schools are represented. The greatest and most prolific of those schools, those nearest home, either not in no appearance worth mentioning, or else only a very few pictures. Of the works of Meissonier, and Scandinavia is illustrated almost as well as, or even better than, in the international exhibitions of 1862.

To the nation for which, before the alliance with perfide Albion, our illustrious ancestors fought so many battles, and which, in spite of all fees, the warmest sympathy, the following well-known French pictures have found places:—"The Last Moments of Marie Antoinette," Picard of a Dog," by Rosa Bonheur; the head of "A Monk," worthy of any old master; "Lecture," by Jules Breton; "Portrait of a Lady," by Ernest Duverger, contributed by Mr. Gambart. Voilà tout—that is to say, all "worth mentioning."

The contributions from Belgium are much more numerous, but of low average quality. However, the following may be applied with the request of the "Slaughters of Malmaret" (328) to another locality. The astonishment of the cabbages on the windows of cretaceous, sharp, and such like mysteries of the Western feminine toilet, is well rendered and the thousand details of an Oriental interior are realised with great fidelity. There are also a number of works like "Portrait" (389), by L. Devinne, of very rare excellence; an admirable "Portrait of a Lady" (440), by Madame Wagnon; a fine picture (in the music-room), by J. Stallaert, painted in a fine historic style, of "The Reception of Charles V. at Ghent" (441), by the late Verlat; with Penelope turning sadly towards the moonlit window without recognising her husband (Ulysses) in the beggar; and two pleasing heads entitled "Neith" and "Soulh," by the eminent Belgian animalier, Verlat. The "Portrait of Cardinal Consalvi" (442), by Madame Wagnon; "Portrait of a Lady" (443), by Madame Wagnon; "Portrait of a Lady" (444), by Madame Wagnon; "Portrait of a Lady" (445), by Madame Wagnon; "Portrait of a Lady" (446), by Madame Wagnon; "Portrait of a Lady" a work of his studentship. By Major Fowell there is a small group of a "Field Fight," a slight but vivid sketch. By the late J. Hogan, the Irish sculptor, there is a statuette of "Eve" (53), starting at first sight of death—i.e., a dead dove—rather mannered and weak: some of the forms; and by J. H. Kirk, another Irish sculptor, a "Psyche" and "Sappho" (66), somewhat injured in effect by the heaviness of parts.

But, as remarked in connection with our Engraving of Miss Rossers group, the finest sculptures in the Exhibition are this lady's "Faun and Satyr," which we may say, en passant, has been purchased by Mr. Guinness; and the "Saul," by another famous American sculptor resident at Rome, Mr. Story. The statue is engraved in full in our colonial. The King is represented seated, when "the evil spirit from God is upon him" (1 Sam. xvi. 23), that spirit expressed only by David's playing—a service which the jealous Saul afterwards rewarded by seeking his life. The weight of sin on his throne, looking with dilated eyes and the keenness of dementia in her terrible fascination, gaied, his whole frame convulsed. With one hand he clutches at, to fear, his closest friend, the only one who can help him—a sword in his side; yet the terror of his aspect is dignified by Michal Angelesque largeness and severity of style. Mr. Story's statue of "Cleopatra," invoking Heaven's assistance, though noble in character and good in action, is not, to our sense, made by the Jewish heroine has a modern air, and her expression is somewhat tame.

On the English sculpture we need not dwell. By C. Fraikin there are a "Fury of the Woods;" (33), a statuette of "A Sleeping Vestal" (57), and others of this eclectically sculptor's productions, either meretricious female representations. The grave-standing figure or epitaphic one of "Mildman" (236), by J. Wyatt, is a poor affair, the drapery obviously serving as pedestal. A marble group entitled "Venus chips Cupid's Wings" (3), by T. (?) Geefs, is cleverly executed and pretty. It would make a small-sized group for a lady's boudoir, but cannot rank high as art. By the characteristic but sensitive Pavid sculptor, Gibson, there is a bust of the composer of the German oratorio, R. Cassor, there are two or three pleasing small groups; and there is a large bronze group of "Cupid and Psyche," most grand, modelled by M. Geles, of Berlin, not in the catalogue.

In the large and miscellaneous collection of Mr. Gambart's exhibition every day being augmented—we have principally to note the excellence of the workmanship, due to the trained and practised manipulative of sculptors among the art-loving Italians, in a country the very air of which has, as we have remarked, of course, the Apennines—is of the sculptor's raw material. But we shall name only a great deal of power wasted through indefiniteness of aim or upon unsuitable, frequently trivial subjects. Such is the case with Bartolini, which the nature of the material will never permit to be satisfactory. The most remarkable sculpture in the exhibition, Bartolini's statuette, too restly wrought, and consumptious colossal marble statue of the Pope, by F. Matteo, partly illustrate what we mean. The commission for the office of his Holiness may be admitted to account for his being represented in a sitting attitude, though they cannot account for the beautiful forms of "drapery" in the sculpturesque sense; but it will not account for the artist's having placed the hand of benediction on the kindly and benevolent face of Pius IX., still less will it excuse the attempt to render in marble the patterns, the very web and woof, of the vestments he wears. To Signor Bartolini's statuette, named "Spring Girl," as well as a copy, are here—our remarks will, however, more directly apply—and the same spirit of error may also be the more pernicious, because he is undoubtedly a sculptor of ability. What shall we say of a girl of the age represented by him who has put her doll to bed in a sort of steel-cradle, and who, resting him on a half-reclining attitude, is understood to sing the lullaby of the title, "Hush! don't wake my baby" (18). The expression is good, certainly, and the action of the head indicative of the most festival an incident worthy of being laboriously recorded in imperishable marble; but the "Spring" is water-colour subject, not the appropriate medium? Then we have statues in the "picturesque" style (the term we employ, of course, generally speaking, without exact criticism) of Italian women, called "The Bean Seller" (20), the Corsican ownership of the sculptor; and—following the success of "The Reading Girl"—"The Sewing Girl"—a girl swinging on a seat hung from the branch of a tree, and pushed by a boy. We may not say "amorino" is so naturalistic a representation—a subject very skilfully treated, with much graceful composition of figures, but entailing a conventionality in the accessories out of harmony with the rest of the work. We may, in a word, say we much prefer to associate the sculptor's name with a statue, just arrived, of "David," proceeding to sling the stone at Goliath—a subject most nobly spirited and natural in attitude and expression. Another distinguished Italian sculptor is the picturesque style, G. Strazza, sends us ably-executed statue of "Islamael," lying fainting with horror, and his attenuated condition is unfit for representation as well as unauthorised: and we may also name "Courage," of a Neapolitan fisherboy to draw the fuse from a bomb about to explode. With all the praise included in repeating the subject, generally speaking, of "Retard Diogenes," by R. La Barbera (Palermo), a shrivelled, naked old man is not a pleasant object for contemplation. The colossal marble statue of "Diana" is hackneyed in treatment, and fails to raise interest—which a real subject would—in modern. C. Fanditti, of Milan, has a statue of "Camilla" prepared for war, with sword and shield, a boy's head on her shoulders, as she might have gone forth to assist Turnus against Æneas; and standing, or rather about to stand, graceful, and beautiful: an effective and spirited figure in the ornamental, and beautiful conserving mention in this style are the "Spring" by Vela; "Girl dwelling a rose" (unfinished), by Fredda; Fortuny's statuettes of two (we believe), resident in London. "Modesty," a statue by Q. Corbellini, expresses the sentiment with pleasing delicacy. A "Cleopatra" recumbent (with some tacit reservation) is also due to G. Argenti's "Eve after the Fall" sitting in grief, and "Paolo and Francesca" (1), by G. Mazeppa, very spirited, a tour-de-force in execution; and "Michael Angelo when a child examining the head of a faun" (2), by the same artist, are remarkable for their truth to nature. We may, with some reasonableness to that of Mr. Lucas, one of the new members of the Water-Colour Society, name among the most original of the different foreign works in line, and, in the same room, admirable etchings by Hermann Bouvier and Rudolf Lehmann.

The collection of photographs is of unexpected richness and excellence. In actual photography Mrs. Cameron, the late Lady Llewellyn, and Mr. Rejlander take the lead, and in the more characteristic working of the art all the best manipulators are in force. The Stereoscopic Company also has a large and full list for the sale of their photographs from objects exhibited in the building.

ART-MANUFACTURES.

We have glanced at some of the most interesting results of the combined efforts of the artist, designer, and manufacturer in the Exhibition—sculpture, painting, engravings of objects for book illustration. Space remains here only to offer a few general observations upon the various works of art-manufacture.

Commencing with the prominently-placed French contributions, we may say and we have said elsewhere that Paris still maintains her supremacy in many branches of industry of importance to those engraved; and, as agents, Messrs. Carlman and Cottelen, of Cannon-street, London, show (besides a large assortment of inferior clocks) imitation bronzes cast in zinc, of course less spirited and finished than real bronze, but not in the same proportion that the price is diminished. There are also silks and velvets from Paris, Lyons, and Tours; shawls from Paris which may be compared with the Paisley shawls; and lace from Chantilly, no addition to the cabinet engraved, there is likewise a small but good show of decorative work, carvings, and furniture by the Paris houses of Fourdinois, Diehl, and Grohe, and Wehler.

The division which collectively makes perhaps the best display is that of furniture and decoration. Among the London houses Jackson and Graham, J. G. Crace, and Gillow are foremost. The first of these exhibit a decorative combination adjoining the French department which forms the principal object in the nave, and was used for the ceremony of the opening. It represents, by means of a dais and massive velvet canopy, a sectional part of the floor, wall, and ceiling of a room identical in style with that adopted by the firm for the decoration, from the designs of Owen Jones, of the palace of the Pacha of Egypt. On the dais are some cabinets decorated with exquisite carving and inlaying. The decoration of the largest and finest bedrooms in the building, from the eminent London manufacturers mentioned, is by whom Messrs. Jackson and Graham are the English agents. We need not say that the leaves of Barbedienne's catalogue is a vast number of reproductions from the antique, and many original works of great merit. The bronzes handled and modelled by the manufacturer are specially remarkable. Mr. Crace exhibits beautiful paperhangings in the Gothic manner. These are also in this section no more perfect piece of workmanship than an ebony and ivory cabinet by Gillow. The Minton's English and two Scotch firms are well represented. Of the Dublin makers, Messrs. Waterford's glass is the best. Their interior of a room is very creditable, and its suite of furniture in oak, carved in the same time, tasteful in design, and more thoroughly finished than is usual with Irish manufacturers, is very good. Beyond this, and another case of fancy articles, in leather, wood, &c., Mr. Baker and Brothers' stand is principally occupied with very successful imitations of Sevrès, Dresden, and other descriptions of china; Take the Austrian contributions, which are in the "Class 4 Miscellaneous"—here is nothing from Austria or the other German States indicative of standing of manufacture. The Austrian Government and of the Belgian collections we have only to add that there are some really good specimens of carving in wood, some of carved furniture of merit, and some beautiful specimens of Brussels lace.

The Italian Court, the principal exhibitors are S. Ellacombe, Coventry, and Hart, of London. Both have fine collections of Venetian glass and mosaics. And these, with contributions from Hardman, Cox, Harland, and Fisher, Birmingham; Hart, Manchester; Hancock from the South Kensington Museum; and a collection of antiquities of various descriptions from Messrs. Webb, of Worcester, illustrating Medieval Court. But, in general metal-work, we miss the names of some of the most distinguished English houses, and, as a whole result, it all, better represented.

Certainly the most attractive of the sections of the Exhibition. Mr. Alderman Copeland's manufactures form a large, varied, and splendid collection, and the productions of Messrs. Minton, Mr. Blashfield has a large and varied collection of "Stone China," and of ornamental articles, only surpassed in modellings of the human figure by some large and fine specimens of Messrs. Minton. Mr. Blashfield and Mr. Magnus's decorated state may be mentioned. The most noteworthy of the productions of the Worcester Porcelain Company are Mr. Trumper-street, and Messrs. Powell and Co., of Whitefriars. The productions of the Royal Porcelain Works and the engravings commemorative of the Exhibition on two goblets very artistic. A most extensive and admirable collection of works in glass is that of Messrs. Powell, and the Royal and India House collections. The passages connecting the different principal buildings are lined with carpets from the imperial manufactories at Abbeville, and with Axminster, velvet, Brussels, and other carpets of every description and colour drawings, chromolithographs, colour-prints, and wood engravings.

We have alluded incidentally to some of the Irish stands and cases. But such is the peculiar characteristic of the Irish manufacture, as Irish poplins and lace, the linens of Belfast, and the hose of Balbriggan—to name only three staples—are not represented in the Exhibition. Nevertheless, we must observe with regret that the Irish manufacturers generally have not availed themselves of the display in the kingdom in matters of taste and design. Those who have the welfare of Ireland at heart, and who would fain encourage the diffuse art-education, by Schools of Design or other means. Take the Irish carpets, for instance—and this for instance—are fabric, as artists will say, more suitable than silk itself for most purposes, and as beautiful in its own quiet yet rich self-colours that, for persons of taste, are the best of all carpets. Yet for hangings and the upholsterer it may be desirable that it should be figured, and accordingly there are looms which weave both figures and embroidery. But with what results? Hardly any that we saw last did not exhibit the true vulgarian and picture it. So with the Irish (Limerick) lace; an effective and stately kind of lace, closely resembling Honiton, but with a bolder pattern, and similar to the Brussels and the French! As for the book-ornaments, the less said about them the better. Of the Irish manufacturers, in point of design, the better. Killarney is famous as almost the only place in the British Isles where the arbutus grows, the beautiful luxurious; and there a manufacture of furniture has been established from the arbutus wood. Its elegance is there in the specimens of the manufacture in this exhibition?

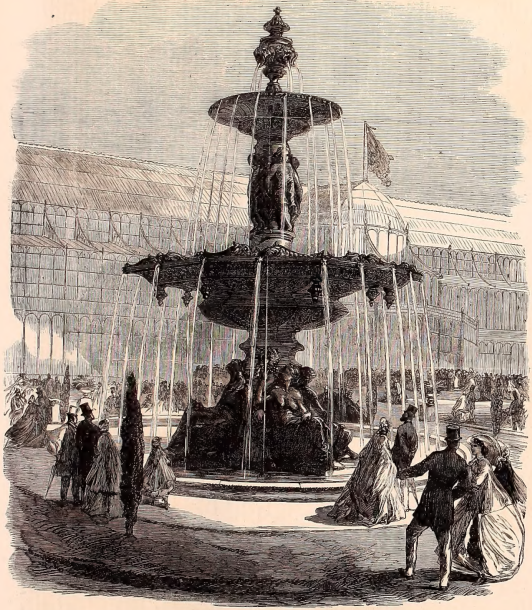
The Rev. W. W. Howard, her Majesty's Inspector of Church Schools in Devonshire, has been appointed Chaplain in Ordinary to her in a school in which the Church Catechism was taught by repeating it after the teacher from the pulpit, and the children were not aware that the imposition was held:—"I believe God father sincerely make from and earth and in Jesus Christ is only son of conceived by the Holy Ghost born of the birch in mery suffer under pontius pilate yea quoth fide and dead buried, and the third day he rose again."

Arrangements have been made with the French Post Office, by which, in future, letters may be forwarded to any part of France or New line of French mail packets established between Shanghai and Nagasaki, touching at Chefoo, Hiogo, and Yokohama. The rates of postage are as follows:—Letters not exceeding 7½ gr. 5d.; every additional ounce, 5s. 8d. Letters for Japan not exceeding 7½ gr. 5d.; every additional ounce, 5s. 8d. payment of double the above rates of postage. Newspapers—1d. each, not exceeding 4 oz. Other printed papers—Not exceeding 4 oz. in weight, 2d.; not exceeding 8 oz., 3d.; every additional 4 oz., 1s. Upon letters other than those the senders may wish to register, the postage may either be paid in advance or left to be paid on delivery, at the option of the sender; but the postage on newspapers, books, and other printed papers must, in all cases, be prepaid. The French packets leave Marseilles on the 15th of each month for Alexandria, in correspondence with a line from Suez proceeding to Shanghai; and the English packets leave Southampton on the 16th of each month for Alexandria, in correspondence with a line from Suez proceeding to Shanghai; and mail for postal in or reach London, at the latest, in time for the day mail to Shanghai, in time for the night mail of the 17th.



THE FARM.

WHAT with the cattle plague hurrying in the air, and wheat sprouting in the ground, the farmers are having an anxious time of it; and the weather prophets may be said to be at sea—neither a curious coincidence. The rain sales go on gaily enough; and Mr. W. Hewer's fifty shearling rams and one old ram sheep have averaged £21 15s. 9d., Mr. Rigden's lettings is set for Aug. 25, and Mr. Kirkham's for Aug. 31.

Mr. Colling, the eminent cattle-breeder, has published a very excellent letter in the agricultural papers on the subject of the cattle disease. He repudiates the notion that the disease has been imported from abroad, and maintains that it has been proved that any foreign cattle are diseased, but, on the contrary, they are more sound than the English, Irish, and Scotch. "I have had eight years' trial from a term of thirty years' experience. He mentions, in support of his opinion, a curious fact that they are "specially and almost invariably" bought for the Jews, who pay more attention to the cleanliness, wholesomeness, and sound state of food than many other people. He, in fact, points out appointed to see the animals killed and to minutely examine the carcases. The result was that one out of the 600 cattle or so bought weekly to supply the Government contracts were foreign, which would not be the case unless they could pass the two inspections at the docksyards. Last Monday week no less than 3000 foreign cattle passed the metropolitan market, all perfectly sound, some of them making an average of 90 stone. Some cattle and numerous cows from Brenen going as high as £30 each. Hence he doubts the wisdom of the prohibition of cattle into Queensland, and considers it a fortnight in the vicinity of London, where they might imbibe the very disease which is supposed to exist in them. It was decided last year by a large meeting of graziers and salesmen, with Mr. Giblett as chairman, that the Islington Cattle Market Grounds concerning, but the said-mouth disease was caused by a baneful atmospheric influence. He therefore contends that the disease is not contagious, and that the disease is imported, to consider the present plague as a sort of obscure in the case of adds that there is nothing antagonistic to this theory in the fact that the cowsheds of London are generally pestiferous, as fever decreases in the localities which are badly drained and not properly ventilated. About 1847 the disease England was similarly imported at that time no foreign cattle were sent.

Mr. Strafford has published a small volume of his Herd Book, in which the bull numbers run from Abana (21,136) to Zealous (23,252), the last number but one. The cows, heifers, and at times pecuniary, Ah! Here, Boy, Foolish John, Manasses, Mr. Bunting, Old Fowler, Nineteen, Roly Poly, Sir Arthur, Tom Thumb, Wonder, and many more of each a namesake, and there are three Belvedores and three Blair Athols. The bull calves number 1 to 20, the cows 1 to 20, the heifers (including the new creations of Rosehill and Olney); and the bulls, 121. The bull numbers are headed by Forth, Duke of Towneley, Tenth Grand Duke, Knightley, Prince Rupert, and Thoroughbred. The females include Betty Gwynne, Duchess 84th, Grand Duchess 8th, Lady Selina Spencer, Queen Victoria, Queen Mary, Royal Duchess, and Sweetheart 5th. They are drawn on stone by Mr. Gauci, who in once Mr. Bates's herdsman, and acknowledged portrait painter to the shorthorn and Hereford world, and has taken several sketches at the Royal Farm.

BRONZE FOUNTAIN IN THE GARDEN.

FOUNTAIN IN THE GARDEN.

For the production of tasteful sculptured fountains the French have been celebrated since before the days of Jean Goujon; and they are as far in advance of us now as ever. To say nothing of the magnificent fountains of Paris and Versailles, in what provincial town of France would they tolerate mere water-spouts such as those at Trafalgar-square and the Crystal Palace? The fountain which is erected (besides a smaller specimen by the same firm) in the prettily-laid-out gardens of the Dublin International Exhibition, though it may appear to untravelled eyes something quite unusual and ornate, is only one of a kind that the French manufacture by the score. In design it is Renaissance, like nearly all French fountains, and its figures and ornaments are drawn from classical mythology. The style certainly admits of that freedom in the introduction of allegorical figures and conventional emblems without which it is difficult to understand what meanings and associations, or decorative interest, could be given to so artificial a thing as a fountain. Compared with the licentious picturesqueness of many French fountains, however, this is comparatively simple and symmetrical. Round the stem, beneath the central basin, are an egeal and a youthful river god and two fluvial goddesses, with the usual aquatic emblems; and round the stem above, backed against it, are four genii joining hands. Masks, garlands, dolphins, water-plants, and mouldings complete the ornamentation; and the jets of water are arranged to spring from the top of the stem, or the figures and masks round the basins. The figures were modelled by a sculptor of great ability, M. Moreau. But what is, perhaps, more noteworthy in regard to this fountain is the fact that it is of cast-iron, a material which, although it will not acquire the rich "patina" of bronze, will, if kept bronzed, answer every purpose of the alloy, and admits of a very great reduction in the price. Such large and artistic iron castings are a remarkable and unrivalled feature in French manufactures. The agents, Messrs. Carlhian and Corbière, of Cannon-street, exhibit in the semicircle of the nave a collection of iron castings of large statues, groups, pedestals, and ornaments of various kinds from the foundries of Messrs. Barbezat and Co.—the same who cast the fountain—and the cleanness and finish of these castings are extraordinary. On a slight inspection they would hardly be detected from real bronze. It is difficult to believe that they have not been laboriously finished by hand after leaving the mould—though this is, of course, almost impossible. Messrs. Barbezat and Co. are the largest cast-iron founders in France. At their foundry at Val d'Osne they employ, it is said upwards of 500 men.

A "PIETÀ."

ALTHOUGH there is no direct authorisation in the Gospel narratives for this representation; although it can only be said (setting tradition aside) that the taking down of the body of our Saviour from the cross was very probably witnessed by his mother Mary, yet the incident of this group has, doubtless, been regarded for many centuries in the Roman Catholic Church as having actually occurred; and to doubt it would probably be deemed heretical by every pious Catholic. The fact of the admission of such a representation into the Church would be quite sufficient authentication. While, too, it has not the spiritual and symbolic meanings and accessories of the "Virgin and Child," which we have also engraved from this exhibition, the mode of the representation is nevertheless almost as strictly defined, the subject is nearly as frequently to be seen, and the remarks we have made on the class of works to which M. Montagny's group belongs, are closely applicable to it. So generally recognised has the subject been that the Italian word pietà long since acquired a special technical sense in designating it, in addition to the other meanings of the word, such as love of kindred, piety, and pity. The inexpressible pathos of the subject, as well as its adoption for ecclesiastical purposes, has, perhaps, swelled the number of the great artists who have ventured to treat it. The reader may remember many noble versions of the subject; but we will content ourselves with recalling the most famous—Michael Anglo's "Pietà," in the Capella della Pietà, in St. Peter's. The particular repetition by Mr. J. Farrell, of Dublin, which we have engraved, is creditably modelled, and distinguished by considerable feeling, without being spasmodic and repulsive, like the treatment of the subject by some modern Italian sculptors.

A "PIETÀ," PLASTER GROUP, BY J. FARRELL, OF DUBLIN.

"MATER SALVATORIS."

THIS alto-relievo, or, as it might, perhaps, more properly be called, mezzo-relievo, belongs to a similar class of religious art to that of the groups of "The Virgin and Child" and the "Pietà," which we have also engraved, and of which class there are many examples in this exhibition—although, of course, to the large proportion of Roman Catholics to be expected among the Dublin visitors. But it is a more naturalistic representation than the group of the same subject just mentioned. The artist has, however, introduced the emblem of Christ's future sufferings, and represented the Divine Infant regarding it with omniscient prevision. The "Mother of the Saviour"—to translate the patristic Latin of the title—seems also to foresee or feel a presentiment of her son's passion as she sadly kisses his head. The composition is similar to many of the Madonnas of Raphael and the early Italian painters, as well as to many reliefs by Italian sculptors—to name one, the highly-interesting unfinished relief by Michael Angelo, which, with the "diploma pictures," and other art-treasures, are lost to the public in the rooms of the Royal Academy. The execution of the work we have engraved is good, and evinces knowledge of the true principles of plastic treatment on a tablet ground. The relief is in a carved frame; it has the title and name of the sculptor incised on it, and was doubtless intended for the chapel of some church, or a private or conventual oratory. It is not in the catalogue (2nd edition), nor among the sculpture generally, but is to be found against the wall in the Roman department.

"MATER SALVATORIS," MARBLE ALTO-RELIEVO, BY SPERTINI.

"THE KISS OF JUDAS."

THIS is a reduced replica of a group by a Roman sculptor of eminence, Cav. T. Jacometti, which has already had considerable success. The conception appears to us to have much merit, and the workmanship is unquestionably excellent. In this unrelenting and quibbling age there have not been wanting apologists even for Judas—men who would not even have "tied a millstone round his neck." But the sculptor, mindful of the exigencies of his art, has made Judas sufficiently hateful and contemptible in appearance, without descending to undignified or revolting grotesqueness and distortion. The Judas of the artist is a small, but well exactly a mean-looking man: his shock head, hard, strongly-marked features, "villainously-low" and beetling brow, aquiline nose, thin nostrils and lips, and farouche moustache, are the stereotyped characteristics with physiognomists of bold and crafty treachery and murderous ruthlessness. In rendering the expression and gestures proper to our Lord and his betrayer there was, of course, much scope for displaying dramatic, pictorial, and graphic power. The expressions and gestures actually given appear to us very suitable and highly dramatic. The artist must have advanced towards Christ with stealthy cowardice from behind, or like Joliffe also the hand behind him in which he grasps the price of blood, the thirty pieces of silver. Yet with what horrible familiarity, with what easy ease and self-possession does he bow that sacred head to print on the brow the kiss which has become the type, the very byword, of utmost perfidy! The contrast of the expression and gesture of the Saviour deserves, we think, the highest praise. With what all-knowing consciousness and God-like mercy does the Redeemer receive that profane hand and that polluted kiss! How admirably is the human and divine nature of the God-man indicated in the right and left portions of the right hand, and in that awe-moving expression shading the steadfast provision and resolve to drink the bitter cup which must pass from Him! Finally, the sculptor has gone very near to produce something memorably great in art.

PRINCE ALFRED'S MAJORITY.

By order of the Duke of Coburg-Gotha the solemn declaration of Prince Alfred of England (who is the heir to the Duchy) having attained his majority took place in Rosenberg castle, on July 31st. Accompanied by the Prince, the Duke repaired to the Hall of Audience, where Dr. Minister Von Seebach was in attendance summoned in a deputation of the Ducal Ministers. Turning to his Royal Highness, the Minister read the following address:—

Most Illustrious Prince.—By the wish and according to the order of his Highness the Duke, I have first to communicate to your Royal Highness the text of the House law and constitutional ordinance which renders this day of light to the Ducal House, and to the Ducal Diet, the entrance into your Royal Highness' own person.

Art. 6 of the House law ordains—"The Princes and Princesses of the Ducal House shall attain their majority upon completing their twenty-first year." Section 11 of the Constitution coincides therewith, which fixes the period of majority and capability to reign of the Duke, as well as of every Prince belonging to the Ducal House, according to the completion of the twenty-first year.

The present day, therefore, confers majority upon your Royal Highness, accompanying it with greater independence and full legal responsibility of action. Hitherto this has been by his Highness the Duke exercised in your name or dedicated to you.

Among the rights and duties which now attained majority grants to and imposes upon your Royal Highness is especially to be mentioned the independent representation of agnatic interests in the administration of the Crown lands and of the remaining estates belonging to the House, and which have come down by the house law.

Your Royal Highness will undoubtedly find cause to acquaint yourself with the state of the law bearing upon this subject, as well as with the actual facts relating thereto. While I therefore express to your Highness my wishes to your Royal Highness's copy of the most important laws referring to the matter, I have, at the same time and the assurance that it is the most sacred duty to both departments of the State Ministry to afford your Royal Highness in the discharge of this duty any support desired, and to render all information and guidance.

May your Royal Highness deign graciously to receive the sincere congratulations now presented by the most joyful occasion. I venture to add those of the members of the State Ministry here present.

The Duke of Saxe-Coburg, Duke Alfred, and the Ministers then entered the Throne-room, where a grand gala Court was held.

Mr. Frederick Peel's health has compelled him definitively to resign his secretaryship to the Treasury.

Last year there was an increase of 473 offences, compared with the previous year, against the game laws. The convictions were 9,110 to 10,117, of which 5147 were for trespassing in the day time in pursuit of game; 3,015 were for night poaching; 1,955 for having game in illegal possession; and 8 offences against the Poaching Act of 1862.

A report has been issued by the Select Committee of the House of Commons "appointed to inquire into the constitution of the Committee of Council on Education, and into the manner in which the business of the office is conducted, and also into the best mode of extending the benefits of Government inspection, and the Parliamentary grants to schools at present unassisted by the State." The minutes of evidence are appended to the report, and fill a large volume. The committee do not themselves express the opinions of reformers to them. They recommend the separation of the education department, and the system under which the annual grants for the promotion of popular education are administered, from the examined present and former presidents and vice-presidents, and the secretary, of the committee of council, and several of her Majesty's inspectors. They have also taken evidence from various parts of England with respect to the policy of making a certificated teacher an indispensable condition of State assistance to a school, and with respect to the existing practice of the education department, as the important subject of the pupil teacher, and the adoption of the remainder clause. Your Committee are obliged to state, with regret, that, owing to the lateness of the session, and to the peculiar circumstances of the present Session, they are unable to report fully upon the subject of the inquiry which has been referred to them by the House, but are of opinion that, although so much evidence has not yet one-sided, it will be found to be of great interest and value. The question raised in the second part of the inquiry, whether it is not desirable to extend the benefits of Government inspection and the Parliamentary grant to schools at present unassisted by the State, is one which will call for extreme importance to the promotion of popular education, that your Committee think it desirable that further evidence should be taken upon the subject of this portion of the subject, which they have hitherto touched only incidentally, or not at all. Under these circumstances your Committee would greatly regret their inability to complete the duty intrusted to them, they have therefore to request that they may be reappointed to continue the inquiry which they have resumed. They therefore recommend that the appointment of the next Session of Parliament, a Committee should be appointed to consider the same order of reference as the inquiry which they now find themselves unable to conclude."

Dr. Colenso, Bishop of Natal has died in Chancery a bill of complaint against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Vice-Chancellor Sir Page Wood, the Lord Bishop of London, Mr. Robert Gray, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, and the Attorney-General, for the repression of his heresy, which is part of the Church of England, has been being withheld. It sets forth that in the year 1841 the then Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Howley) called a meeting of the bishops at Lambeth Palace Rooms, when it was resolved to make more adequate provision for spreading the principles of the Church of England in the colonies and dependencies of the British Crown, the resolutions being signed by all the bishops of the United Church of England and Ireland, who were present, including Mr. Gladstone, Vice-Chancellor Wood, the Archbishop of London, and Mr. Richard being appointed treasurer. The plaintiff, Bishop Colenso, appointed the council of the Colonial Bishopric Fund agreed with her Majesty's Government to contribute £1,000 per annum for ten years to the support of the Bishop of Natal, and £500 per annum for ten years to the support of the Bishop of Sydney, and £601 10s. per annum for ten years to be duly paid to the plaintiff after his consecration by the treasurer above named, including the half-yearly payments due on the 1st of July, 1865, which have since been paid, and in the month of July, 1864, the plaintiff received a notice from the clerk of the treasurer, in which it was stated that the first payment of the salary hitherto allowed for the bishopric of Natal to be reserved and carried to a separate account, subject to the following conditions:—

"The council having received a caution against continuing to pay the salary to anyone save by the bishopric of Natal from the Bishop of Capetown, on the ground that he had deprived the Bishop Colenso of that post, and appointed another bishop in his place, and that the bishop was not entitled to the existing arrangement, the salary has been paid into a separate account." The plaintiff, having stated that he makes the Archbishops defendants, he expressed the whole of the proceedings to be void, and he advised that her Majesty's Attorney-General is a necessary party in the matter of the petition for the confirmation of the irrevocable appropriation of a portion of the fund to the endowment for all time of the see of Natal, prays as follows:—1. That it may be declared that, out of the said Colonial Bishoprics' Fund, a sufficient part has been irrevocably appropriated to the endowment for all time of the Bishop of Natal for the time being, and that the said annual income of £601 10s. has been duly paid to the plaintiff as the Bishop of Natal, and is payable to Natal for the time being, and that the same may be ordered and paid accordingly. 2. That the first defendants may, in particular, be declared trustees for the plaintiff of the two half-yearly payments reserved and carried to a separate account as aforesaid, and may be decreed to pay the same to the plaintiff, with interest, from the dates on which they respectively became due, as aforesaid. 3. That the defendants other than the Attorney-General may be decreed to pay the costs of this suit. 4. That the plaintiff may have such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require." An appearance has been entered on behalf of the defendants, and the case will be argued after the long vacation.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

CONTINUING the chronicle of the last election, it may be observed that a good deal has been said with regard to what was taken to be a predetermined effort on the part of the metropolitan constituencies to dignify their representation, and to remove something like ridicule from the designation of metropolitan members. Whether this has been really an effort on the part of the electors it is not necessary to curiously to inquire; but the fact of an improvement, and something more, in the personnel of the London representation is undeniable. The electors of Finsbury have been much lauded because they have got rid of Mr. Ross; but, if we be just to position where that gentleman was not, as member for the borough, a strictly representative man, and the successful candidate, Sir Alderman Lusk, was a Scotchman and has been a Sheriff, as is the case with Mr. Lusk, is but a neutral-tinted affair, after all. Which, however, you come to consider representation in the abstract, it must by acknowledged that Mr. Macdonald, who is selected by the Marylebone electors, who is a practical as well as a philosophical politician and a man of business, and who is not without experience in Parliament, having sat for Dundalk from 1848 to 1852, and for Great Yarmouth in 1857. Under his present designation he is a representative man, and one who, in the House, and lately, he was known as Mr. Thomas M'Cullagh, but now the name runs the other way, being M'Cullagh Torrens. The borough of Tower Hamlets has returned a very strong opposition, to be under the influence of the marquisate of Bath, but, of late years, the borough has assailed by Mr. Ayrton, and, in the last Parliament it was represented by Lord Edward Thynne, brother of Lord Bath, who did not stand, and the seat was won by a man against the Conservatives by Sir Henry Rawlinson, whose name is so well known in connection with military and diplomatic services in India and Persia, and who has been political Secretary to the Government of India, Resident at Candahar, Minister to India, and Minister Plenipotentiary to Teheran, to accept which last post he resigned the seat for Reading, which he was elected in 1858, and which he gave up out of the occasions to the new Parliament. The membership for the city of Gloucester is the result of one of those compromises which are sometimes unavoidable, and which sometimes they appear to be bought and sold, it may be, without their own consent; though, of course, neither party would have entered into a bargain to sell to himself to say. The late members, Mr. C. Berkeley and Mr. Powell, G.C., equally respectable gentlemen, and Mr. C. J. Price and Mr. C. J. Monk were re-elected, not, however, without a contest with a Conservative and a Liberal opposition, which had been defeated in 1859, when the borough was nearly disfranchised for proved corruption; but their incapacity to sit having terminated with the late Parliament, they were allowed to supersede two rising members who won their places fairly, and no questions are asked. Mr. Price, Mr. Berkeley, and Mr. Powell are within the borough, which he represented before from 1852 to 1859; and Mr. Monk is one of the Gloucestershire Monks, and has been, I am nominally a barrister; and in their case there is no change in the representation, Gloucester having returned Mr. C. J. Monk, from 1857 to 1852, and from 1857 to the end of the late Parliament, there being for the first Parliament the Hon. Fleetwood Hesketh Tollemache, a near connection of the Earl of Dysart, who, formerly ranking as a Conservative, voted for free trade in 1846, and pulled party into the Liberal ranks. He sought re-election; but being opposed by Mr. J. H. Theobald, eldest son of Sir J. C. Theobald, Bart., of Ayston Hall, Rutlandshire, there is now a Liberal opposition after an exciting and riotous contest, in the course of which polling-card and bludgeon were freely used. The borough returns but one-and-one state of the representation which had hitherto prevailed was Conservative, Gloucester having returned Mr. Monk after late member, Mr. Welby Gregory, having been returned. There was a great deal of excitement at Sheerness when Mr. Otway, a Conservative contending for the seat left vacant by Mr. Augerstein in that of Mr. Alderman Sidney, was defeated by Mr. Locke, the last, the best "man won—Sir Charles Bright, civil engineer, whose name is well known in the electric world, having been the first plotter in the country, and possesses estates besides in Devonshire and Pembrokeshire, but is a resident engineer at Sheerness.

As Captain Jervis has retained his seat for Harwich, it makes little difference that Colonel Rawlinson, the Conservative, who was one of the late members for the same constituency, who will go down to posterity in connection with the building for the Exhibition of 1862, and not the less because he was not the first, but the second Conservative who sat in the new Parliament; at Hereford, Mr. Baggallay, Q.C.—well known as one of the leading counsel in the case of the Queen v. Overton at the bar of the Rolls—after a sharp contest, ousted Colonel Clifford, an esteemed member of the late Parliament, who represented the county as one of the Conservatives; while, in Herefordshire, Mr. Biddulph, a gentleman of the county, whose father was one of the members for the counties Lord William Graham, Conservative; and Sir Joseph Bailey (Liberal), one of the members for Hereford, have been returned unopposed by the retirement of Mr. Milbank, Liberal, the political status of the representation remaining unchanged. The election for the county of Wilts has been the most important of the year, Lord Ernest Mr. Henry Cowper, brother of the Earl of that title, broke into the Conservative phalanx which had remained unbroken since 1832, and the Liberals, but for the deliverance of a grand monody on the lost one by Mr. Disraeli, would have had the whole of the seats for the county at the poll. This is one of those Liberal triumphs in the counties of which we have had so few of late years, and, as Mr. Sidney Herbert is concerned, for his speech at the declaration of the numbers was a blank as regarded the Liberal cause, Lord Ernest Bruce having had a contest in Honiton for the seat which Mr. Moffatt formed, Mr. Hurst, the new member, being a resident proprietor, and son of Cochrane (Conservative); but at the head of the poll was Mr. Divett, who was one of the members for Exeter in 1857, and, with Mr. Rotschild, the new member for Aylesbury, makes the number of avowed Jewish members of Parliament six instead of four, as it will be until new about since the period of emancipation. There was so general an expression of regret from persons of all parties acquainted with Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald as a statesman and member of Parliament at his having lost his seat for Horsham—being replaced by a Liberal—that it may be some satisfaction to such persons to know that Mr. Fitzgerald gave way before powerful local interest, Mr. Hurst, the new member, being a resident proprietor, and son of a gentleman who for many years represented the borough. Those who have at all studied Parliamentary idiosyncrasies will, perhaps, be of opinion that of all men and members Mr. Leatham will feel the loss of his seat at Huddersfield; and, truth to say, the electors of that borough have stultified themselves not a little by rejecting so rising and, in his way, so able a man as their late representative. But, no doubt, they found the local and personal claims (politics being equal) of Mr. Crosland, whom they have chosen, paramount to the distinction as happily represented by one of the ornaments of men in the late House. At Hull, the electors have returned the best whist-player in England, and a very judicial member, in the person of Mr. Clay; but the Conservative element, as well as the Sunday-closing and anti-alcoholic principle, has been eliminated from the representation by the defeat of Mr. Somes, whose place has been taken by a Liberal, Mr. Charles Norwood, a merchant and steam-ship owner of London connected with the trade of Hull, and vice-president of the Board of Commerce and Shipping, so that he is not devoid of qualifications for the adequate representation of the borough. The Liberal interest here occurs before any disturbance in the English representation of Parliament, and the only change we reaches West Kent that a change is found; for, although there was a sharp contest between the rival candidates, Mr. Hubbard and Mr. Cole, the old member, one and one to politics, were returned. In the western division Sir John Lubbock and Mr. Angerstein (Liberals) struggled hard, but in vain. Against Viscount Chelsea (Conservative) and Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Hart Dyke, who undertook to fill the seat which Sir Percy Herbert left vacant by his death in the last Parliament, succeeded. Mr. Hart Dyke is but young (he was born in 1837), is eldest son of Sir Percy Hart Dyke, Bart., of Lullingstone Park, near Dartford, and was, we hear, one of the best racket-players at Oxford when a member of the University. It was at Kidbrooke that her Majesty's Government received check by the defeat of Colonel White, a Lord of the Treasury and a member of the whipping-in staff. He fell before the prowess of a candidate who is set down in the chronicle as Mr. Albert Grant, F.S.A., M.I.E., one of the late Herr Gottheimer, of Germany, born at Dublin 1830, educated in London and Paris, assumed the name of Grant in lieu of his patronymic in 1863 "for all time and for all purposes," which is unanswerable.

The result of the election at Knaresborough deserves special notice, for not only have both the members been new men, but they have lost a voice in the strictest and yet fullest sense of the word; for Mr. Collins, who has been a shrewd and business-like member, was master of marvels to his party—was the organiser of eccentric noises which are such a characteristic of the Conservative party in divisions; while his Constitutional tendencies were developed in a remarkable degree during the time the country carried on by Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli. He may take comfort to himself in the consciousness that he is not alone in the fate of the party, one in which he was so constant and mobile an actor. His successor, Mr. Isaac Holden, is a manufacturer at Bradford and a gentleman of position and influence in that town, in 1857, and will be a silent vote. There is little need to dwell on the return of Mr. Thomas Hughes for Lambeth, which, in the absence of candidates, would have been made sufficiently notorious, in the best sense of that word, and his return is a matter of course. The borough has been served him to a London alderman whom they had had on trial for three previous Parliaments, and whose election; and it is to be doubted whether it's second candidate of the like calibre had been started the local annals of the borough, and which, at any rate, have not have been wanted. Still more superfluous would be comment or politics on the fact of the return of Mr. Hadfield for Sheffield, Lancashire, where he pushed out Mr. W. J. Legh, the late Conservative member. That affair speaks for itself. In the late Parliament Marylebone was represented by Mr. Ashburton, who, as Mr. Ashburton (as a way under the pseudonym of "Sam Slick," and two or three times he grew Mr. Ashburton, was one of the most unpractical philosopher; but he was physically but feeble, and his retirement was regretted. He has been succeeded by Mr. Alexander Campbell, of Werrington Park, Launceston; and in that address will probably be found that he will be a more active member than either he otherwise be a Scotish by birth and breeding, and a merchant in London, of large position there. It has been generally supposed in Leicester that it was a Radical town, and it was perhaps rather incumbent than not that the Conservatives should be represented, but by a Conservative member, linked as he was with such a free-thinking colleague as Mr. Peter Taylor. However, this time the borough has resumed its former Radical tone, and Mr. Heygate, who was a country gentleman not far from the borough, has returned another Liberal in personal county and the county and borough—and a Liberal, to the person of Mr. J. Harris Dove. The retirement of the Hon. Colonel Fremantle, Conservative, who succeeded (one takes to give the whole name, as Burchell did to sound that of Lady Caroline Wilmot Horton) Mr. Ewart, the late member for Lonsdale for Mr. Walsh, son of Sir John Walsh M.P. for Radnorshire, Conservative, and Mr. Hutchinson, Liberal, who sought to fill the place vacated, prevailed; and, as far as the balance of parties is concerned, the representation is unchanged, though when Mr. Cecil Raikes, who sat for the other member, takes his seat for Oxford University there may be another chance for a Liberal. Considering that the patronage secretary to the Treasury is seeking re-election, and that the son of a Wing nobleman who is Lord Lieutenant of the county of Sussex was a candidate for the representation of Lewes, the electors and non-electors of Lewes were, backing up two Conservative candidates with a Liberal opposition, a decisive mandate for the Liberal pretenders; and it was through a hearty ordeal that Mr. Brand and Lord Pelham, who succeeded to fill the place vacated by Mr. Blencowe, the late member's retirement were returned. Ichelsea was another Metropolitan election, for Lord Alfred Paget, who was a servant of the electors for a period approaching twenty years, and holding an office in the household which bound him to the Government, was opposed by Mr. Tyrwhitt Drake, who was supported as Richard Dyott, of Freeford Hall, Lichfield; and, as a claim, has been Mayor of Lichfield, and Sheriff of Stafford. In a manner, Lincoln has reverted to its favour for the Liberal Party, Mr. Seely, who sat for the city in the late Conservative member, Mr. Bramley Moore, a son of Mr. G. F. Heneage, a former member for Lincoln, who used to fill the place now by the representation of the borough by the death of Major Sibthorpe, regarded the seat as a kind of fief for Great Grimsby and Great Lincoln, but without success. Here there is a gain of a Liberal vote. The annals of the election for the city of London, in point of party, have been the same for the seats for Mr. Lyall and Mr. Fowler in the Conservative interest, when they come to be written, are not of much interest, for both of the former members, Goschen, Crawford, and Rothschild—having been certain, though the latter was elected on the poll, and Mr. Crawford retained at the head of the poll—while the choice of Alderman Lawrence was owing probably to his having canvassed the electors for the Mansion House, and to the fact that no other Liberal candidate presented himself. At Liverpool the Hon. Sandy Lindsay, brother of the Right Hon. Colin Lindsay, has been returned for what is, doubtless, the steady Conservative respectability of Mr. Samuel Graves, who is, in fact, a magnate of the town, of which he was Mayor, in 1861; while, as commodore of the Mersey Yacht Club, he is probably personally acceptable to many persons in the maritime population. Mr. William Rathbone, a member of Liverpool, was not deficient in boldness and self-complacency; but he had not, of course, the personal influence, and position, and connection of Lindsay, when he had represented since 1863, at the late election, as Lord Sandon's colleague. Mr. Rathbone, who fought the Conservative cause against Sir William Yardley, as Sandy Lindsay did against Mr. Rathbone, and previously Captain Clive, the late member, the political unity of the borough. Mr. Severne has been a member for Shrewsbury, and has represented Parliament in Northamptonshire, Shropshire, and Montgomeryshire. There has been but one change in the representation of Lyme-Regis; Mr. Treeby, a London merchant, who has a country-seat near the town, and who sets himself down as a Liberal-Conservative, fills the seat vacated by Colonel Pinney, and which he won out of a contest with Mr. Hawkshaw, the celebrated engineer. Mr. John Henry Gurney, who represented Lyme-Regis since 1854, retired at the close of the last Parliament, and Lord Stanley has now for a colleague Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart., the bearer of an honoured name, who triumphed over a strong effort to retain the wholly Conservative representation of the borough, and who enters Parliament with the prestige of having succeeded in winning a vote for the Liberal party.

CURRENT LITERATURE

Cornwall and its Coasts. By Alphonse Esquiros. (Chapman and Hall.) Cornwall, having been lately visited by the Royal Duke, runs the risk of becoming fashionable; it has long deserved to be popular. Fact has invested it with no ordinary interest, and legend has added to fact all the embellishment of romance. No county more worthily claims the attention of the autumn tourist; it is the land of mines and miners—of wrecks and wreckers—of lighthouses and lighthouse-keepers—of dangers by sea and gallant rescues; the olden haunt of giants and fairies, and nurseries of mermaids; the privileged grounds of awful Druids, and the home of the fabulous Pendragon; the tilting-ground of > that Arthur who, with lance in rest,

> From spur to plume a star of tournament,
> Shot through the lists at Camelot and charged
> Before the eyes of ladies and of Kings.

But M. Esquiros fails to say more than the romantic side of his subject; his book, however, is very interesting, and is written in the easy, graceful style which distinguishes the charming author of "The Dutch at Home." It was originally presented, though in part only, to the translation; else M. Esquiros is a wonderful proficient in the English language.

The Regular Swiss Round. By the Rev. Harry Jones, M.A. (Alexander Strahan.) A book for the Alps, profusely illustrated, and opportune; for the time for tours has arrived. It contains a description of three trips, during which very gratifying mountains and the usual Swiss round. There are no ascents of mountains recorded: the only attempt at climbing made by the author resulted in a failure which he considers would insure his "being blackballed by the Alpine Club;" and he writes "merely as a common tourist." The style is the colloquial, abrupt, semi-facetious.

Flowers, their Uses in Nursing: a Nursery Book of Botanical Flowers. Compiled and Illustrated by John B. Sowerby. (John Van Voorst.) Botanical students will no doubt appreciate this volume, many pages of which are devoted to scientific analysis and classification; flowers are "taken principally, with permission, from Professor Babington's excellent Manual of British Botany."

The Publishers' Weeks of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. (George Routledge and Sons.) We have here, in small and convenient form, a new edition, in diminutive but very clear type, of Longfellow's poems, including "The Hanging of the Crane" and "The Masque of Pandora," a delightful little volume.

The Arabian Nights' Entertainments. (George Routledge and Sons.) How Scheherazade, of inexhaustible memory, spreaded the wrath of the Sultan of the Indies and saved her sex from destruction, may now be read in a single volume, which, notwithstanding its eighty paper, and goodly print, is entitled to take its place amongst the wonders of small and book-trade.

The Restoration of Health. By William Strange, M.D. (Longmans.) The object and tendency of this little work may be gathered by any one to be his own doctor, but rather to enable everybody to get a correct idea of certain physiological conditions upon which the health, or good or bad health, the physician is not or is needed, and somedoses can or cannot be resorted to the with the best effect. Some of the remedies may sometimes be avoided; how, when it has not been avoided, it may sometimes be taken away without medical assistance; how, when the professional doctor must be called in, and what course he and the workings of his remedies may be intelligently appreciated; and how the economy of the sick-room should be managed. The book will be the worse—and many will, no doubt, be the better—for becoming possessed of the information contained in it.

Life and Writings of Joseph Mazzini. (Smith, Elder, and Co.) This is the second volume of the "Life and Writings" of Mazzini, and contains critical and literary notices. Mazzini will always have a political reputation sufficient to insure for his writings a sale, either claims to fame or notoriety; but, as a mere contributor to literature, he unquestionably penchant and ability. We are not speaking about the correctness or incorrectness of his criticisms, or the wild and visionary or sober and truthful nature of his views, renders him conspicuous amongst newer-writers. The translation—for such it appears to be—is perhaps—abridged many of the essays.

Sovereigns. By the Author of "Mary Powell"—Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.) A one-volume tale, constructed upon a plan which, if the author intends his readers to be of any consequence, must be of skilful treatment. An imaginary place is endowed with the characteristics of several places, and is called Sovereigns. The author made the chief scene of a little love-making, a good deal of proselytising, and some characteristics of the Roman Catholic persuasion abroad; and, to complete matters, contributions have been levied upon "the authors of "Daily to Sovereigns," and "Sovereigns to Capers," upon "anonymous writers of one or two magazine articles," upon "sundry religious reports," and upon "the newspapers of the day." The writing is sufficiently good; and the author is with his paper Roman Catholics and at least one Jew are converted to Protestantism will be found very much to the by societies which have such conversion for their object, and will perhaps atone in these days for his difficulties encountered in the task.

Bells Dog's Cream and Prawn. (Saunders, Otley, and Co.) Hard words fortunately bound to bones, for the dictionary and the dog alone have been a tuition of manuals. A better abused party never carried a war to a recognised claim, and by no means scarcely "had roundly abused than by "Belle Boyd," and her husband, Mr. Hardinge, in these two volumes in which the "Belle" herself respective sufferings are recorded. The martyrs do not confine themselves to personal grievances; political opinions are also freely excluded. It is probable that when the reader discovers who "Belle Boyd" and Mr. Hardinge were—that the former, had it not been for her sex, would undoubtedly have been hanged as a spy, and that the latter was a renegade from the Federal cause—he will certainly not have treated not have treated with such distinction, whom it would be absurd to hold responsible for occasional vulgar brutality on the part of underlings, or for the consequently "bad style," and, with the sensitance of the portrait upon the frontispiece, will be a great deal of doctrye those statements which the woman suggested of "a belle rebelle."

London Labour. (Hurst and Blackett.) A plotless novel, in three volumes. It is a quasi-autobiography, and is written, for the most part, feebly and pointlessly. Some of the characters are drawn with considerable subtlety; there are several charming sketches, and more than one excellent moral. The French nurse is beautifully conceived, and in many points, especially her love for her foster-child, is really touching; but her broken English is scarcely natural, and the French words she introduces seem to be put in for the sake of what she would have left out. The feelings of the sister upon learning her brother's love for the pretty sweetchy of no interest to the world, and nearly every scene where pathos is required is excellent. Moggy, however, is not a heroine, a failure, indeed, as an attempt to depict a "social evil"; of, even though she is ultimately married; and this her marriage is the most unsatisfactory part of the book. It appears proudly of my old schoolfellow," scarcely accords with one's notions of fitness. It was meant for a consolatory termination, but, from our point of view, but neither socially nor morally was there anything to be proud of.

One Against the World. By John Saunders. (Tinsley.) A threevolume novel, without much plot, illustrating the difficulty of retracing one's steps after a descent to Averno—a difficulty easier to late before him who would fight his way, in the teeth of the world, from unchastity to virtue. The hero did not deserve the reward that for his first, or nearly his first, step was to shoot dead his "pal," who married sister, perhaps, at other hands, but who was dear to all his brother-thirst. What sort of adventure is to be met with in the book may be conjectured from these words of the hero: "This is the big fish he was to land, and the bargain of scarce a week ago, now going with innocent and confiding ladies to church in the very neighbourhood that has been clamorous with excitement about his and his late companion's doings?" In fact, it is the old story of the gentleman-frequent, with nearly all the old incidents—the beautiful young lady who loves him at first sight, the discovery that he is a thief, &c.—with the novelty that he repents and endures innumerable hardships in his struggle to regain a footing amongst the honest, instead of dying "game" upon the gallows. But then, now are not hanged nowadays for theft. He, however, after the old legitimate style of the hero, "determined to turn to a property, and all but brains his father. This sort of story is not much in vogue now amongst the more intelligent class of novel-readers; but it seems to have in it the groundwork of a melodrama which would "bring down the house" at the Victoria Theatre. The speech in which the hero, having enlisted, having been late at parade, having attempted to strike his officer, and having been, consequently, court-martialled, explains his lateness at parade on the ground that he was in love, and remains to the court, "your honours are men! You have loved!" would move a transpontine audience to tears and thunders of applause. In the first page of the first chapter of the first volume there is an expression which must have been written under the influence of a temporary aberration of mathematician or chemicalising principles: we read that a gigantic landlord "dropped, with a crash on a table, which, breaking at the knees, into his wooden chair, with its old-fashioned projecting sides and high back slipped over it, and on to the arms also." Should not read "about" instead of "acute"? Otherwise the lack of the chair would have brought inwards and the back of the landlord's head would, in all probability, have suffered.

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

RAIL RESSELL having seen occasion, after an experience of nearly three years, to revise the regulations for the examination of attachés in her Majesty's Diplomatic Service, which have been issued by Lord Clarendon, 1857, has deemed it advisable to amend those regulations and to lay down in the following Order in Council the conditions which will be required of candidates for admission to the Diplomatic Service, and the junior members of the Diplomatic Service should prove their competency for promotion to two higher appointments in the Diplomatic Service.

In the first examination, which candidates for attachéships must be prepared to undergo, they will be examined from the 1st to the 15th December they must satisfy the examiners in regard to the following points:—

1. Geography; 2. History, Constitutional and Political; 3. Précis writing; 4. That they are well grounded in Latin grammar, and are able to construe and turn into prose a portion of some good classical author; 5. To give the derivation of words; 6. That they are acquainted with the first four books of Euclid; 7. That they have a general knowledge of Arithmetic, including Vulgar and Decimal Fractions, Proportion, and the first book of Euclid; 7. That they have a general knowledge of geography; 8. That they have a general knowledge of English grammar; 9. That they have a general knowledge of English history; 10. That they have a general knowledge of German grammar; 10. That they have a general knowledge of French grammar; 11. That they are able to translate from English into French, as well as from French into English, and can translate correctly from English into French, as well as from French into English, and can translate correctly from English into French, as well as from French into English, and can translate correctly

"FRATERNAL ASSISTANCE."

THIS picture, by the Düsseldorf artist F. Boser, arrests the eye disposed to skim over the numerous academic, or more or less artificial, works surrounding it, by virtue of its fine tone, perfect naturalness, and a certain spirit and freshness rather unusual among foreign pictures. Nothing can be more simply natural or descriptive than the expressions of these little folk. The good housewife, whose multifarious duties, in addition to superintending her little daughter's education, are indicated by the half-peeled potato, the pincushion and scissors, the ball of knitting-worsted, and other articles in this humble interior, to say nothing of the birch, doubtless in terrorem merely stuck behind the looking-glass—the housewife, we say, has evidently set the little girl too hard a sum. So, in the absence of mamma, there is perhaps a little innocent roguery going on. The little maiden appeals for assistance to her brother, who is, mind you, an old and profound mathematician (at least a year older than herself), and has prosecuted his studies at some seminary of learning in or near the village. This wise brother then comes and sits down on her stool, and, smiling at the notion that she should find a difficulty in it, at once kindly solves the problem; nay, more, he condescendingly explains its solution, while the little girl, listening reverentially and looking aside in deep abstraction, seems on the very point of apprehending the abstruse demonstrations of her instructor.

"THE LETTER."

THE Milanese sculptor of this statuette, Signor Tantardini, has acquired considerable reputation, both for ideal and naturalistic works. In the statuette which we have engraved the aim is, as we must think it, somewhat lower than in former works from the same hand we have seen. The sculptor here joins the host of his Italian brethren who strive after a picturesque and taking effect in sculpture. This little work is, notwithstanding, charming of its kind. The figure of the lady is refined and her costume graceful. Her employment, too, awakens interest, though we do not see that the perusal of the "letter" excites in the fair reader any emotion in particular. The chief peculiarity in the workmanship is one common in modern Italian sculpture, and consists in the representation not merely of "drapery" in the old sculpturesque sense, but in the trivial imitation of the texture of silk, its angulise folds, breaks, and "eyes," and even the original creases formed when it was in the piece, before it was made up.

"THE LETTER," MARBLE STATUETTE, BY A. TANTARDINI.

"THE VIRGIN AND CHILD."

WE engrave this group, by a French sculptor, M. Montagny, not only because it is an excellent piece of workmanship of its kind, but also because it is representative of a phase of art, or—as it might generally be more properly called—of artmanufacture, which is in wide demand in Roman Catholic countries, and is largely exemplified in the Dublin Exhibition. This Virgin and Child may be said to belong to a distinct class of iconographic art. It is an instance of art with, as the phrase is "a purpose," as was that of the old Greeks. Its destination is, doubtless, the Church, and it was designed to appeal to faith and to quicken devotion rather than to challenge criticism and gratify æsthetic sentiment. Precisely similar compositions, occasionally like this, in white plaster or marble, but more often sumptuously coloured and gilt, and frequently clad in actual draperies of the richest description, and bedecked with gold and silver ornaments and precious stones, are to be seen in every Roman Catholic church at home as well as abroad. Being intended strictly as, at least, a visible medium for adoration, the whole conception is conventional; it is neither imitative nor representative. While preserving the relationship of Mother and Child, the artist does not present the Virgin and the infant Saviour as they may have appeared on earth, but as they should be perceived glorified through the eye of faith. The "Mother of God" stands on the world "bruising the head of the serpent," and inviting all men to accept her mediation and receive pardon and blessing from her Son. The Divine Infant, though still carried in his Mother's arms, is invested with the sovereignty of the world he has redeemed—typified by the globe surmounted with a cross which he bears in his hand; while, as the glorified Saviour, he raises his two forefingers making the well-known sign of benediction of the Western Church. Once such a conventional representation as this is adopted, nothing in the history of art is so remarkable as its uniform preservation from age to age. Here we have the same ideas that were embodied for representation a thousand years ago in Byzantine mosaics, the same that were transmitted in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth century sculptures and paintings, and so on by, for example, Van Eyck, Raphael, Murillo, the conquerors of South America, and, with but few variations, the monks of Mount Athos. The explanation, of course, is that the representation—the image—comes unconsciously to be regarded as sacred because what it represents is sacred. To attempt to make the least change in the forms or symbolism of such an image would have been deemed as heterodox as to try to subvert the established ideas it embodies.

"VIRGIN AND CHILD," PLASTER GROUP, BY E. MONTAGNY.

"PENELOPE AWAITING THE COMING OF ULYSSES."

THIS statuette, by the distinguished German sculptor, Brugger (a pupil of Schwanthaler), though a little conventional and cold, is, notwithstanding its reduced scale, one of the more noteworthy of the works in the classical style in this Exhibition. The contours, proportions, and disposition of the drapery show a nice feeling for Greek purity, symmetry, and graceful arrangement; while the execution has the conscientiousness which distinguishes the German school. Penelope (the faithful wife of Ulysses, or the Odysseus of the Greeks) stands in a sorrowful, wearied, and almost hopeless, yet still expectant attitude, resting her cheek on her hand, making no pretence to weave her web, awaiting the twenty-year-delayed return of her lord from the Trojan War and those subsequent wanderings of which Homer sings in the "Odyssey." The shuttle she holds in her hand is, of course, in allusion to the web, or robe, regarding the weaving of which she deceived her importunate suitors—the web, or robe, which she declared she must finish for her aged father-in-law, Laertes, before she could make up her mind, and at which she worked in the daytime, but only to undo in the night what she had done in the day—an artifice which has led to the proverbial comparison of any interminable work to "Penelope's web."

"THE IMPORTANT QUESTION."

LIKE the "Fraternal Assistance," engraved on page 172, this picture attracts attention by its unsophisticated truth to nature and its fresh and forcible, yet harmonious, effect. The scene, judging by the costumes, should, we imagine, be the interior of some primitive abode of the upper Rhineland, or the borders of the Black Forest, where you may see bed, sitting, and dining room combined in one apartment. A somewhat similar picturesque headdress, stomacher, and white sleeves to those worn by the pretty maiden in the picture may, however, be met with in parts of Switzerland as well as elsewhere in Germany and some Scandinavian districts; but, on the other hand, the garments of the suitor—his long white coat, leggings, and three-cornered hat—recall the hideous costumes immortalised by Old Frits, Mr. Carlyle's pattern of a King, and not yet wholly discontinued in Germany.

"THE IMPORTANT QUESTION," PAINTED BY C. LASCH.

Then there is the inevitable pipe, without which, surely, a German would be at once denationalised, and could not fairly be expected to make up his mind upon any possible subject, or attempt any practical arrangement, and certainly least of all could he venture to pop "the important question." Bythe-way, we commend this young swain's example as worthy of imitation by all our smoking friends under similarly trying circumstances. Not to say that a pipe may induce a little salutary reflection, there are advantages which may be expected to attend its compassionship, if resolved to risk passing this fateful and fearful crisis. First, it will afford employment in a most embarrassing situation. Secondly, it will be an excellent test of the real state of the lady's feelings; for, of course, no true smoker would contemplate sacrificing his pipe to his sweetheart; nor would any right-minded young woman, with a real regard for her lover, ask such a sacrifice. Thirdly, if accepted, the sedative influence of the weed will help to moderate his more dangerous transports, and he may look forward to peaceful enjoyment of his pipe in his future home. Lastly, if rejected, he will find his old companion a mighty source of comfort and solace. We do not know that there is any other lesson in particular to be drawn from this picture. It certainly does not confirm Mr. Punch's laconic "advice to those about to marry"—Don't! On the contrary, it holds up the institution as desirable. These young people were evidently, as the old gossips say, made for each other; it is highly probable the gentleman will hear in answer to his "question," the "whispered 'No' that gives consent;" it is quite certain he will have a very pretty, lovable, and industrious wife; and it seems impossible that anything can go amiss unless, perchance, it be that the prattle of that little brother on the floor may reveal the visit during the old folks' absence, or whatever else the lovers may not as yet wish known.

This picture by Mr. Lasch is, like the other we have engraved from the Dublin Exhibition, by a painter of Dusseldorf; and it may be interesting to add one or two particulars of that great rival, in Rhenish Prussia of Paris and Rome, as an art-centre, where a large proportion of the painters of Germany and Northern Europe receive their art-education, and the influences of which through the reaction (now broken up) of the Dusseldorf Gallery in the New York Broadway, has been very considerable in America. The Daseldorf school, then, was founded in 1826, under the direction of Cornelius, a native of the town, in whose studio many distinguished artists have been formed; and, curiously enough, the school had its rise after the renewal of the famous collection of pictures, now at Munich, from the palace built by the Elector John William: though a very remarkable collection of drawings by the old masters remains. In a wing of this palace are the studios of the artists, and every summer an important exhibition takes place there. For the production of large historical works this school is specially celebrated.

MUSIC.

Mr. Manns, the able director of the Crystal Palace Concerts, had his benefit on Saturday last, and the vast audience assembled the high opinion entertained by the public of his talents and valuable services. The concert derived an additional interest from the performance of Gounod's opera, "La Reine de Saba," which was performed without the accessories of a dramatic representation, but with a strong body of principals, powerful chorus, and the excellent Crystal Palace orchestra. The scriptural subject of this opera being inadmissible in this country, its title was changed from "The Queen of Sheba" to "Irene," and the characters and incidents were sanctified, in the same manner as Zeuola's "Mores in Egypt" and Verdi's "Nebuchinezzar" were dealt with when heard on our opera stage. The principal vocalists were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. d'Isle-Finlayson, Mdme. Louisa Vinning, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas; and the whole performance was excellent; but the music, nevertheless, went somewhat heavily off, being evidently inferior to the usual "fare" the lovers of the kind ever given in England, or even in any of the finest of the once-famous promenade concerts of the late M. Jullien, who, nevertheless, had the merit of originating the system of entertainment in this country and of laying the foundation of the superior structure raised by Mr. Mellon. At this gentleman's concerts there is food for every variety of taste. The musician is gratified in the classical works of the greatest masters, and the public are delighted with the light and brilliant dance-music of the day. And, we may add, the vast assemblages who crowd Covent-garden and Drury Lane night after night and attentive as if they were attending a concert of the Philharmonic Society or the Musical Society of London.

We observe that Miss Willie Pape, the young American pianist whose performances have excited so much admiration, not only in London but throughout the United Kingdom, is about to commence a fresh professional tour in the provinces during this autumn. We have often had occasion to express our opinion of the highly-artistic attainments of this young lady and highly-gifted artist, whose reputation is now so well established in this country that there is scarcely a place of any note in England, Scotland, or Ireland where her appearance will not be most warmly welcomed. We trust that, after this provincial tour, she will resume her brilliant performances at the Monday pops, where they have already been recognised as one of the most interesting features of the London musical season.

THE THEATRES.

Now that so few theatres are open, and it is left to speculation to guess at the nature of the irregular audiences that may be induced to go there, advertisers manage their announcements so as to attract support and endeavour to create a taste where it is doubtful if any already exists. The extraordinary success of a popular workman are expected to be. They have gone to "The Arabian Nights' Entertainment" for their subject and selected as their hero Mr. Goodchild, whose adventures of Prince Camaralamzan, in pantomime, have hardly followed their authority and partly their own fancy. The latter are not of the most refined sort, and the nigger business brought in to supplement the plot and lead to the catastrophe has nothing to recommend it. The previous scenes, however, are good, and are so well illustrated by scenery, costumes, and mechanical panoply, that we find them very attractive. The Prince is admirably supported by Miss E. Farnie, who plays "The Rocking Bird"; Miss Lloyd, as Princess Badoura Sheridan, who helps Camaralzamzan through his visionary scrapes with fidelity.

In the notice issued on the 28th ult. relative to the transhipment of passengers, troops, took-packets, and mails between Belgium, under the provisions of a new postal convention with that kingdom, it was ordained that, while all letters and parcels sent by the packets of the ordinary mails, at night also, if posted by the public before 8 P.M., would be forwarded by the morning train. It has since been found necessary to withdraw the privilege, and patterns and samples of merchandise are now in the mail viâ France, and to restrict their transmission to the ordinary mail, viâ Ostend.

The report of the Inspector of Mines and Collieries in the Aberdare district for the year ending Dec. 31, 1881, has been issued. The report commences by saying:—"The past year has been one of great activity in coal trade; and, as a consequence, the collieries in the district have had abundance of employment at good wages. Additional collieries have been opened out, principally in the Mid-Rhondda district, and in the county of Lancaster, which has increased the quantity of coal raised; so that the average output in this district of Aberdare is now more than ever it was than any former year. It is satisfactory to find that the increase has been attained with a minimum of a fatal nature as to life, and that the fact is, that while, than in either of the two preceding years—a result saying, doubtless, by increased precautions on the part of the managers and workmen—and next to the adoption, especially in the newer collieries, of improved arrangements, as having under the Act of 1872 been made in the working of the mines, the number of the statute, 1 coal lived of life, 307 persons were killed in the year 1881, as against 307 in 1880, 311 in 1879, 301 in 1878, 298 in 1877, 291 in 1876, 291 in 1875, 284 in 1874, and 314 since 1862. Mr. Moore gives the following statistics regarding the quantity of coal raised during the past year, the number of persons employed in collieries &c.:—"The computed quantity of coal raised in 1881 is 6,400,000 tons; number of persons employed, 13,000; average earnings, 21s.150; lives lost by fatal accidents, 34; persons employed per life lost by accident, 141; tons of coal raised per life lost by accident, 188,235. Regarding the different seams of coal in the district, the Aberdare four-feet seam is the most extensively worked, and in Lancashire the seams are from 2 ft. 6 in. to 3 ft. thick, while in Lochgelly and Dysart the seams are from 2 ft. to 3 ft. thick, with the exception of the famous Torbrinhill coal, which is worked profitably when as low as 7 in. and 6 in. In Edinburgh and Haddington the average is 4 ft. seam, but in some instances it is 9 ft. and 10 ft. thick; and in Fife, Kinross, Clackmannan, and Perth shire, the seams are about 4 ft. thick. The Lochgelly splint coal is working 6 ft. and upwards; and the Dysart coal-field is 10 ft. Complete returns of the number of boys between ten and twelve years of age employed underground show that there is an average of 5 to every 100 of the total number employed, and that there is an average of 7 to every 100 employed above ground. Regarding the proportion of persons killed to the number employed, little during the last year, the report states that nearly a third were "drawers" and young persons whose duties led them to be at the "face," but who could not be held bound to support the roof. The report refers to the introduction of a machine for cutting coal underground, and speaks favourable of the attempt as a means of saving life, as with it two men can perform the work of from eight to ten colliers in "holing."

THE FIFTY YEARS' PEACE BETWEEN BRITAIN AND FRANCE.

Two period of 125 years which elapsed between 1690 and 1815 was signalised by fifty-six years of war between Great Britain and France. Of the remaining sixty-nine years not thirty were free from the anxieties and hopes connected with an immediate expectation of war. Our ancestors may be said, during the space of four generations, to have oscillated between a war and an armed peace with France. The lot of the present generation has fallen upon happier days. We have enjoyed, or at least possessed, fifty years of peace, improved, indeed, by many alarms and preparations of war, but radiant also with some happy intervals of friendly intercourse, cordiality and mutual esteem. As from the contemplation of the past we may derive lessons for our guidance in the future, a review of the chief international transactions between the two great nations may, we hope, be instructive to our readers.

The Government of the Restoration, imposed upon an exhausted nation by the Holy Alliance, could not easily come into collision with the Tory Government of England, which had for its chief the faithful to the principles of that coalition which triumphed in 1814 and 1815. Even, however, the Whig Government of Lord Grey, which, in 1829, on the question of intervention in Spain on behalf of absolutism, was the determined enemy of the Restoration, did not compel to cross that Pyrenees in defiance of the protests of the British Government. Therefore, the Cunning declared that, so long as one ancient ally, Portugal, was spared, Great Britain would not break the peace with France. The conquest of Algiers was another act of the Restoration, which was highly displeasing to the British Government and to public opinion on the side of the Channel.

The Revolution of July, 1830, opened a new chapter in the history of the relations between the two countries. In the first moments of enthusiasm for the new form of government, the middle and the Cabinet of the victor of Waterloo, who, while acknowledging the Government of the July Revolution, felt that wisdom and caution and distrust, was soon replaced by that of Earl Grey, who, as an old Foxite, was favourably disposed to the Philippe-Egalité monarchy.

Two questions immediately arose to put the new-born entente cordiale to the test. The first was the revolt in Poland against the absolutism in Religion; and the known intention of the late Czar to place himself on the head of a coalition against the new régime in France, and inaugurate had stung the Poles into revolt against a policy which would have set them in mortal antagonism to the Power which, in 1815, had restored to Italy from the outset declared that it would not allow Prussian or Russian intervention in Belgium, while to the French it was an open declaration that it would not allow restoration to independence would, moreover, be a common benefit to Europe and to humanity.

Such being the attitude of the French Government, how with the the discontent of the Belgians? Was it not, in fact, a country which gravely occupied the British Cabinet.

In regard to Belgium, it was looked as the condition of its co-operation with France that Belgium should neither be annexed to France nor governed by a Prince of the House of Orleans. The Belgian Republican party was successful, and the result has been that British, abandoning an anti-popular clause of the Treaty of 1815, acted in harmony with France, and, in fact, created the Belgium of to-day, a neutral belt of territory to cover her northern frontier.

In reference to Italy, the result was less happy. The British nation has never yet been so ready as the French to make an immediate sacrifice of its own interests for the sake of a principle dear to the European family. Moreover, the Whig Government had come into office pledged to the policy of Italian national retrenchment. It was impossible, then, that the overtures of the French Government in behalf of the Italian movement for Italian liberty could be favourably received. Nevertheless, it must be owned that the reply of Lord Palmerston to those overtures—a reply in which the refusal to Russia was blended—was needlessly wounding to France, and was such as would have been approved by the bulk of Earl Grey's supporters. It was, in fact, the commencement of that unhappy policy of successive Administrations in this country to keep this correspondence a secret until it was too late.

In spite of the disappointment which the French Cabinet must have felt in the British refusal to sympathise with the cause of the Poles, of Poland, the decade of 1830-40 may be regarded as the brightest period of the fifty years' peace. It was one in reference to which question of the two countries upon Europe, to the absence of irritating questions between them, and to the feeling of friendship which the two peoples. The cause of constitutionalism was forwarded by the joint or parallel action of the French Government and the British Government in Italy, and Greece. The anti-slave-trade treaties of 1831 and 1833 conceded a mutual right of visit on the west coast of Africa, and the suppression of the Spanish Succession War, which, as we were the Saturnian days of small armaments and low national expenditure, was the only one which was undertaken in this period to appeal.

After twenty-five years of peace, the entente cordiale was suddenly and abruptly broken. In the words of Mr. Cobden, "Two rival statesmen, the two most powerful men in Europe, have chosen to consummate skill the combative pride and the soaring vanity of these great nations, have encountered each other on the field of battle, where France was especially sensitive to defeat and loss of influence." As the Syrian embroglio was the immediate cause of the rupture between France and France that has occurred during the fifty years' peace, we may be allowed to dwell upon it for a moment.

In 1839 the Sultan of the Turks of Egypt, who was tributary his Sovereign, the Sultan; he had been successful, had driven the Sultan's troops out of Syria, and had made himself master of that province. He was the protégé of France, and, after the battle of Nezib, French influence was paramount at the Ottoman court, which became the Taurus into Anatolia. In return for this act of moderation, the French Government had given assurances that the Ottoman amount to a guarantee that he should remain in possession of Syria. In opposition to the French Cabinet, Palmerston, Aberdeen, and Melnias stood forth as the guardians of the rights of the Sultan. The Cabinet of M. Thiers then offered, as a compromise, the retention by Mehemet Ali of Egypt and Syria, but only in the province of Syria. Lord Palmerston still refused to allow the Pacha of Egypt to reap the fruit of his victories. But the Pacha was found on the moderate basis of guaranteeing Mehemet Ali from attack by the Powers of the Holy Alliance. On July 31, 1840, the treaty was signed, to which France was a party, and with this treaty the diplomatic alliance of France came to an end. But the passion aroused by the costly triumph of the British Minister did not so soon subside, and caused a shadow to rest upon the next half of the fifty years' peace. Even the Syrian policy of Lord Palmerston and the Czar Britain to have let Mehemet Ali retain a life-interest in the Government of that Syria which he had conquered and which the Sultan have ever since misgoverned. So did not think the leading statesmen of both our great parties; but so did think Lord Brougham, Sir William Molesworth, Richard Cobden, and all the staunchest British partisans of the French alliance.

In August, 1841, Lord Aberdeen replaced Lord Palmerston in the Foreign Office. He brought to bear upon his difficult task enlightened views, a high-bred courtesy, and a frank, loyal spirit, which were thoroughly appreciated by Louis Philippe and M. Guizot. Unhappily, while Frenchmen at home and abroad were snarling under the sense of an unavenged affront to French honour and a check to French policy, the entente cordiale between Lord Aberdeen and M. Guizot could not bear its legitimate fruits. The French Chamber of Deputies and M. Guizot first of all to refuse his assent to the treaty of December 20, 1841, which extended the right of visit reciprocally to the crews of the two nations on the west coast of Africa, and afterwards to press for the abrogation of the separate anti-slave-trade treaties of 1831 and 1833. The Government of Sir Robert Peel acted with great good sense on this question, and, notwithstanding an unfriendly treatment of the situation, the responsibility for which they threw upon Lord Palmerston, By the treaty of May 29, 1845, the reciprocal right of visit was abandoned, on the demand of France; but it was agreed that two squadrons on the west coast of Africa should act in concert, as far as possible, for the suppression of the slave trade. This treaty was to have effect for ten years, and it has not been renewed since the period of its expiry, in 1855.

As if to show how far Lord Aberdeen and M. Guizot had ameliorated the relations between the two countries, the period with the Palmerston-Thiers period, the Queen and Prince Consort (September, 1843) visited the King and Queen of the French at Eu, proceeding by way of the Channel Fleet, by whom, as well as by the inhabitants, the representatives of the British State were most cordially received. In October of the following year the King of the French visited our Queen, at Windsor, and received from our Court and people a welcome which he acknowledged, partly by the Corporation of Dover, in words which it is not inappropriate now to recall —

I have this country with a heart deeply impressed by the general greeting which I have received from, and the feelings which have been evinced towards me and my family by, the Queen of England, above all, by the manifestations of friendship and affection which I have received from her Majesty. They give me a favourable opportunity to express my deep conviction that those sentiments of amity so essential to the maintenance of peace and to those good relations between the two countries which are so much for the interest of both nations, are shared by the whole nation. I can find these words in the heart of the wishes of the British nation, and I have no doubt that they will be appreciated in my country.

It was observed at the time that Louis Philippe was the only French monarch who had ever landed in the British islands on a visit of peace and amity.

In the midst of this exchange of pledges of amity an untoward circumstance arose. The Spanish match came to mar the equilibrium of the hour and to revive some the old antagonism. We allude to the Tahiti entanglie (1844).

The French Government had assumed, in 1843, the protectorate of Tahiti. In the exercise of this limited right of sovereignty, Vice-Admiral Dupetit Thouars, then the British Consul, who was also a missionary, named Pritchard, as an agitator and plotter against French authority. The Admiral took on his engagage to leave the Pacific. Sir Robert Peel denounced this action in the House of Commons as a gross insult to the British nation. M. Guizot calmly responded that he did not justify it, and offered to pay an indemnity. This concession was once celebrated "Pritchard indemnity" was denounced in France as a base truckling to British susceptibilities, and accepted in this country as a tribute to the Odessa dynasty. Lord Aberdeen was too sensible and considerate for the difficulties of M. Guizot's position ever to demand payment thereof.

The re-accession of Lord Palmerston to the office of Foreign Secretary was a signal for the renewal of the entente cordiale and the renewal of discord between the two Governments and their respective publics. A set-back was sustained on the question of the Spanish marriages had been arrived at by M. Guizot and Lord Aberdeen, an understanding which included both the Queens and the French Bourbons. Lord Palmerston, by his instructions to Sir Henry Bulwer, in April, 1846, had stimulated the ambassador of the French King and Minister took the alarm somewhat prematurely and hurried on the marriage of the Duke of Montpensier with the sister of the Queen of Spain. "The English newspapers," says Miss Martineau, in her history of this period of the peace, "could not forgive the cheat; the fear was lest the crown of France and Spain should be found on the same head. The Queen could not forgive the slight; the short of the death of all the Duke of Montpensier's elder brothers and sisters, which would have kept the crown of Spain from the heirs of Spain. The fury of dissension which prevailed during the controversy looks now ridiculous enough." The Revolution of 1848 speedily after the inculpated marriage, revealed to the world the private correspondence of M. Guizot with the Queen. The Quarterly Review, in June, 1848, commenting upon the same, says :—"The affair of the Spanish marriages is complicated enough, but at the bottom of it lay the two parties to the transaction except Lord Palmerston. A series of private, confidential notes addressed by M. Guizot express the strongest opinion on his Majesty's part to follow exactly the engagements that had been made with our Government on that subject."

The Queen herself was also concerned in protesting against the annexation of Cracow was followed by a rivalry with her for influence in the internal politics of Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Italy, and Portugal. The consequence of this irritating policy was that at the end of last year, 1881, and the beginning of 1846, occurred a crisis has denominated the "first invasion panic."

This panful crisis was terminated by the overthrow of the Orleans dynasty in February, 1848. The Provisional Government, which was formed on the morning of 1815 had for France not been to exist, qualified this declaration by another that this situation "was in nowise irreconcilable with the principle of peace." The Provisional Government disconcerted the filibusters who made inroads into Belgium and Savoy, and informed the deputation of Polish refugees that their "wish was to live at peace not with this or that party in Great Britain, but with the whole British nation." On this side of the Channel the Revolution of 1848 was greeted with the most cordial manifestations of national hostility which were poured out upon its predecessor of 1792. M. Lamartine pays high compliment to Lord John Russell and Palmerston for their attitude at this crisis. He declares that the British Government checked the Republic more consideration than he had bestowed on the Constitutional Monarchy of July. In his history of the Revolution of 1848, he says:—"To urge Minister of the Republic says :—"England, by accepting the fraternity which was offered to her by the Republic, by the Republic, by the whole people of mankind. The Administration of Lord Palmerston still gather the fruits of that great moral victory. . . . . Lord Palmerston has never evinced less political susceptibility at certain acts and words of the Republic than they would, perhaps, to a firmly-seated Monarchical Government. It was necessary to have made allowances for the difficult circumstances against which the Government of the Republic had to struggle for the preservation of peace. In their forbearance they allowed time to French policy to establish itself, and in doing that they rendered themselves guardians of the peace and of humanity. Democracies are prone to take umbrage. It was a great thing for the Republic to have found a minister who understanding anti-British prejudices. A display of impatience on the part of Lord Palmerston would have been misinterpreted by the people and the political life when he was most statesman-like, because most forbearing and philosophical."

The Italian policy of the new Government was a source of great anxiety to the British Government. The latter, in opposing the views of France, the temptation to guarantee the freedom of Italy from the Alps to the Adriatic was almost irresistible to the French Republican. But a war of liberation in Italy meant for France the annexation of Nice and Savoy, and this was objectionable to British statesmen of both the historical parties, because it would augment the area of French territory. An unforeseen event, the great Communist insurrection of June, came to the aid of British and Conservative policy. The Government of General Cavaignac, which issued from that bloody conflict, was much less disposed for a war of liberation than its immediate predecessor. General Cavaignac and M. Bastide accepted the idea of a joint Franco-British mediation between Austria and the populations of the north of Italy, which mediation Austria, by her Fabian policy and delay and expedients, found means to evade and nullify.

In 1859 a difference of opinion between the President of the French Republic and Lord John Russell's Administration concerning the mode of settling the claims which the British Government had against that of Greece, and on account of which the former was blockading the Piræus, led to the departure of the French Ambassador from London. The rupture, which continued for about five weeks, was healed by the acceptance of the French proposals for the settlement of the questions at issue between King Otho and Lord Palmerston, and by the arrangement concluded between the ambassance of a British fleet.

The year 1860, or 1861, was assuredly an event which gave a grave shock to the popularity of the French alliance in Britain. Although Lord Palmerston and our aristocratic statesmen and the impressions of Parliamentary government in France either with indifference or indifference, although the Manchester Liberals loyally accepted the policy of the French alliance as a necessity, the 15th, 1851, and on so many subsequent occasions, the mass of the British people, who looked at the event from a more national and popular view, conceived against the Second Empire and its chief a grudge which has not yet been wiped out by success, and which serves to explain several subsequent incidents and crises in the relations between the two countries. This popular feeling of the Second Empire engendered, in 1852 and 1853, the "second invasion panic"—the calling out of the militia, and the reviews of the Army and Navy at Chobham and Spithead respectively. But the British Army and Navy were not destined to meet a Gallic foe. The late Czar, being firmly convinced that the British nation would never ally itself with the French Empire, caught at the first convenient pretext for occupying Moldavia and Wallachia. The first misunderstanding between the two defending Europe against Muscovite aggression produced a rapprochement between the two nations, and in April, 1854, the first alliance between Great Britain and France was signed, in which the allies pledged themselves to fight not for territorial aggrandisement, but for a noble idea. After forty years of peace the public opinion of both nations was with enthusiasm their warlike energies against what was the common enemy of Europe. The intimacy between the two Governments—an intimacy for which Europe was long indebted to the influence over the Coalition Administration of Lords Palmerston and Russell—became so complete that Lord Clarendon declared on one day they were as one Cabinet, of which one half met on the Thames and the other half on the Seine, and that this identity of opinion, outstripping the Channel, left the Old World, outside the Government of the New.

These latter words, which did not fail to rouse the vigilant jealousy of the American, found their application in the joint guarantee of Cuba to Spain against the designs of a powerful party in the United States, in the simultaneous protests against the cruel bombardment of Greytown by the order of President Walker, and in the joint visit of the French Ambassador at Washington to prevent the dismissal of Mr. Crampton.

In the spring of 1855 Napoleon III. and his consort were cordially received by the Queen, Lord Prince Albert, and the nobility and by the hospitality offered by the city of London to Guildhall. In August the Queen, Prince Albert, and their two eldest children visited the enthusiasm of the Londoners on their return visit to Boulogne. They also attended a ball given by the municipality of Paris at the Hôtel de Ville. The attendance of her Majesty and Prince Albert at France deserve special mention—namely, her visit to the town of Napoleon I. in the month of May, 1855, when the camp and the French corps d'armée encamped on the heights of Boulogne. Since the infant Henry V. was crowned in Paris, it is doubtful whether so English Sovereign had set foot in the French capital.

The war with Russia, though costly, was brief and passably successful. Its issue would have been more satisfactory to the British nation had the proposals of the Emperor Napoleon III. been the faithful performance of the stipulations of the treaties of 1815, which were favourable to Italian nationality, a condition of the peace, been accepted by the British Government, and the Conference at Paris, in the spring of 1856, and the French Plenipotentiaries acted unanimously in respect to the wars and treaties of the previous century. Persuasive of a policy then agreed upon, the Ambassadors of France and Russia were welcomed in London, and by the British protest, unimpassioned as it was, against the continued occupation of Rome by French troops contrary to the understanding of policy between the Allies in the affairs of Central Italy. On the question of the union of the Danubian Principles, which was only afterwards sprang up, France sided with the Roumans and Russia, Great Britain with the Turks and Austria.

The Franco-Russian combination triumphed; but this triumph coincided with a closing of screens on the part of our people that Great Britain had come out of the war less powerful than before, and that in some other causes, served to strip the French alliance of all its popularity. On the other hand, the persistent opposition of France to the diplomacy at Constantinople to the French project of uniting the Red Sea with the Mediterranean by means of a canal, a project which maintain the popularity of the English alliance in France. Nevertheless the Emperor, by his offer to expedite the construction of the line in Italia at a crisis dangerous to British dominion there (1857) showed that the Russian War had not impaired his faith in England, and found but good feeling in his influential breast.

On Jan. 14, 1858, an ill-omened event took place which aroused into activity slumbering animosities. Orsini and his companions, issuing from England, made their memorable and happily abortive attempt upon the life of the Imperial pair. Some French Colonists, it was with England, which they denounced as a "den of assassins." The offensive expression for the intended murder was condemned on the occasion which were being voted in England fell to the ground, and the Government of Lord Palmerston, which had come in on a powerful Parliamentary and popular opposition, to effect in the station and a change which would have humiliated any other and less skilled Sovereign as felonies, left office, a martyr to its attachment to the alliance with the French empire. If in the conspiracy of the Orsini attentat and the overthrow of Lord Palmerston's Government had nothing to do with the events of 1859, the former produced a new Austrian policy in the Italian difficulty which had been adjourned since the, in 1856, in deference to British scruples.

The Tory Government prosecuted, but failed to obtain a verdict against, Dr. Bernard, one of Orsini's supposed co-conspirators. Actuated, doubtless, by a wish to heal the breach which, by the consistent conduct on the Conspiracy for Murder Bill, they advised the Queen to pay a visit to the Emperor at Cherbourg on the occasion of the inauguration fêtes which attended the completion of the vast defensive work of that naval fortress and arsenal on the coast.

Another after-effect of the Orsini bombshell was the third, the most protracted, and last "invasion panic," which did not end after a splendid citizen army had sprung into existence, until our fleet had been restored to a state of fortifying the Channel and the Army had received the approbation of Parliament.

The policy of intervention in behalf of Italian nationality was sure to try the patience of England sorely. The statesmen of both our historical parties frowned at the thought of the introduction of a French army into Italy. The Lombard campaign was undertaken in defiance of British remonstrances. Lord Malmesbury declared his "conviction that if Austria entered upon a war with France she was bloodlust on record" and prove "a terrible curse." The pessimising and despising tones of the Tory Foreign Minister's correspondence in the early part of 1859, can hardly be read without a shudder. The war once on foot, in April, Lord Malmesbury and Lord Cowley, and Mr. Russell, did their best to prevent Germany from making common cause with Austria. Lord Derby, on the formation of his Government in the contingency, which British Statesmen had foreseen, occurred. The Emperor claimed Savoy and Nice! Parliament and the press were loud in their denunciations (1860) of Imperial ambition. Earl Russell, in a fiery speech, announced that England must henceforth look out for other alliances. In his despatches he endeavoured to excite a moral coalition against France on this question. He grounded a general opposition to the annexation of Savoy on British jealousy of the aggrandisement of France, and a special opposition to the annexation of certain portions of Upper Savoy, neutralised by the treaties of 1815, in the strategic interests of Switzerland. Earl Russell's coalition zeal was neutralised by the imperturbability of the Swiss Government, who seemed to take a malign pleasure in the spectacle of Austria bombled and England mortified. Napoleon III. was at one moment ready in favour of Savoy, and, in the Parliament, that part of the Genevois to be ceded to Geneva; but the majority of the Savoyards gave him to understand that, if that was his design, they would vote against the annexation to France. Hence arose the famous pyschic demonstrations. Messrs. Cobden, Bright, Bernal Osborne, and other United Kingdom Members of Parliament, opposed during the general current of English feeling on this occasion.

In the month of January, 1860, was signed the Commercial Treaty between Great Britain and France which has already produced such happy results. Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord Palmerston and Russell did not inspect the signature of the additional articles of the treaty in the month of May, 1860, but in the Paris, where the economical and fraternising animus of Mr. Gladstone preponderated over that of the legal fire-eaters. In this connection was not to be forgotten the abolition of passports for travellers from these islands, and several postal conventions, all favourable to increased in streasure and to international peace.

In the same summer the attitude of the British Government at the moment when the Italian Duchies, then in a provisional state, were about to cross the Strait of Messina, caused the Emperor of the French to abandon the project of annexing Savoy and Nice, and to submit his first wish to do.

The massacres of the Latin Christians by the Druses of the Lebanon in the same year led to an armed intervention by the Five Powers, the Emperor of the French sending a force of 6,000 men to occupy Syria by French troops was unwillingly terminated, in 1861, at the instance of Great Britain. In the French Government was able to secure the nomination of a Christian governor for the Lebanon.

In China and Japan British and French policies do not cross each other as in Syria. Of late years French interests in China have often been united with ours in pursuit of a common object in those distant parts of the East. In 1858 Baron Gros declared, against the Emperor of China. The campaign was a short one. The allied armies advanced to Pekin, and dictated peace to the Chinese.

The great American civil war (1861) came to demonstrate to British statesmen the necessity of a cordial alliance with the Government of the Emperor. Earl Russell announced that cordial relations with the French Government had been established. The recognition of the seceding States as belligerents was done in concert by the two Governments. Before the year was out the Emperor had the opportunity for performing a generous act towards Great Britain. On the occasion of the seizure of Messrs. Mason and Slidell, on board the British mail-steamer Trent, by Commodore Wilkes, the French Government lost no time in informing the Foreign Secretary and the then homeward-bound Mr. Mason, United States Ambassador, that American Commodore's conduct altogether. It even feat to our Government a despatch from Mr. Seward, in which the latter set forthwith dispatched to Canada. However, Lord Palmerston's Government, with Earl Russell at the head of the Foreign Department, of the British public, left to Napoleon the sole responsibility of two decisive offers, that of mediation and that of recognition. It was also, with the unanimous approval of public opinion, took an early opportunity of declaring that Great Britain disapproved, originally participated in by France, Spain, and Great Britain.

In 1863, the Polish question came on the tapis for the fourth time during the fifty years. Russia, in fact, had come to embroil the relations between the two Governments. The British Government, with the approval of the French Government, had, in the previous year, refused to join with France and Austria in a collective note to Russia, but it was at the instance of the Duke privately of the Emperor of the French. At the meeting of the Corps Législatif, in November, the Emperor pronounced in favour of the principle that treaties do not exist, an opinion which was denied by Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone, who declared that they differed from the head of the public how of Europe. In the same speech, the Imperial orator advertised his intention to withdraw the French troops from the Papal dominions of Poland, Rome, Venice, Schleswig-Holstein, and Roumania, and then to provide for a general disarmament. Earl Russell stood forth to give this speech the go-grass which he subsequently in a despatch more pleasantness than courteous. He thought that the congress was a good idea, but that it would be well to ensure general peace.

The ink on the despatch was hardly dry before the death of the King of Denmark brought the Schleswig-Holstein question to a crisis, Germany pronounced in favour of Augustenburg. The Court of London, which was one of Lord Palmerston's chefs-d'œuvre. The British Government was a party to the treaty, and had signed the Treaty of 1852. It was now the turn of the French Government to leave a war Minister, the Duke privately of Persigny, to represent it on behalf of Denmark. This action of the French Government in the Schleswig-Holstein affair was a policy long meditated by the Napoleon of Peace. Earl Russell had the manliness to own, in the House of Peers, that he had only to blame himself for the issue. The fact was that he had no valid ground for complaint against the French Government, but his colleagues had. Lord Palmerston, in the House of Commons, have intood towards each other on a not estranged but still cool footing.

The death of Lord Cowley, in July, 1866, removed the last tie to the Executive and Legislature of France an opportunity to manifest their high-esteem for the representative of the Court of the middle-class of this country and the author of the Commercial Treaty of 1860. In the month of May, 1865, the Emperor had the misfortune to be one of our middle classes, to whom it was really, if not ostensibly, addressed, and to which the Government and the commercial and hereditary statesmen could have elicited.

The first grave pass is in course of being celebrated by the visit of the British Queen to the Emperor and Ernst, accompanied by the Lords of the Admiralty; and by the return visit of the French Ironclads to Portsmouth, by the Emperor's invitation to the British Minister of Marine.

The cordial and unbidden of the ancient animosities between the two nations, the corresponding growth of a more appreciative feeling, which constitutes the basis of the present alliance, the wish of the Government in France and the idiosyncracies of individual statesmen in Britain the Government of the Emperor Napoleon have been active in keeping the peace with each other, the increasing consciousness of common duties to be performed in defence and promotion of Western civilization, present solid grounds for a firm confidence in the continuance of peace; but the secret of maintaining an unbroken entente cordiale, as between the Governments of the Queen and the Emperor, and Governments, and between the people of one country and the Government of the other, is to be found in the fact that the two countries fulfilling duties of States policy, by such diverse sympathies and antipathies. In the United Kingdom, which is pre-eminently a land of religion, the secret is one which the present generation has not yet discovered. In France, Napoleon III. has found the secret to be those weighty and inspiring tasks which we must bequeath to our posterity.

A subscription for a testimonial to Mazzini has been set on foot throughout Italy. Subscriptions are coming in from all parts in favour of the project.—"I join with all my heart in a testimonial of gratitude from the Italians to the illustrious citizen whose name is a guarantee an hour which has not been devoted to Italy, a pure aspiration for the national cause, an example of virtue, of self-sacrifice, and of love for the whole Italian family."

The anniversary of the Emperor of Mexico's birthday was celebrated with great solemnity at the capital. The Empress Charlotte, attended by her ministers, received the congratulations of the nobility. It has been the King of the Belgians' parting gift to her, was present at the religious ceremonies in the Cathedral. The Emperor Maximilian has been engaged by his wife in the preparation of a splendid ball, to be held on the evening common and of claiming bells. Her Majesty held a levée at the palace in the afternoon, which was crowded by all the officers of the French garrison as well as by the Mexican officials. It appears that it is not etiquette for the Emperor to be present on these occasions. The Empress, therefore, received the addresses and replied to them. While these ceremonies were going on in the state apartments the Emperor was presiding over the first meeting of the scientific and literary society of the Mexican empire, and making a remarkably good speech to the members. The society has been formed with the object of collecting and publishing the scientific treasures of the country, and the collection of his address to the vast body which has unexplored, specially naming the pyramids Teotihuacan, the gigantic ruins of Uxmal, and the manuscripts which have escaped the fanatic rage of destruction of the Spanish conquerors, which were, as yet, dead letters, awaiting their intelligent study and investigation.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.

In a supplement to the Gazette of yesterday week two orders are published in reference to the prevailing disease among cattle in the metropolis and throughout the country. The first of these documents, after reciting the previous Acts passed to prevent the spreading of contagious or infectious diseases among cattle, and stating that it is expedient to make further regulations on the subject, proceeds as follows:—

Now, therefore, the Lords of her Majesty's Privy Council do hereby, in virtue and in exercise of the power given by the said recited Act, and by the several Acts continuing the same, as aforesaid, order as follows:—

1. That in this order the word "cattle" shall be interpreted to mean any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, or calf.

2. Every animal affected with disease is to be appointed under the provisions of the Order in Council of the 24th of July, 1865, shall have the power of entering upon and inspecting any premises in or upon which he has reason to believe there is any animal labouring under such disease, and of such animals be not often as he may think necessary.

3. Every place within any district for which an inspector and veterinary surgeon appointed as aforesaid, upon whose premises there shall be any animal labouring under any disease, shall forthwith, by or on behalf of the owner of such animal separate and apart from all other animals, and no person shall, without the consent of the inspector, cause or suffer to be moved, or permit from his premises, any such animal, or any animal which has been in the same shed or stall with any such animal, or which he may think likely to have been infected with such disease.

4. Every animal within any such district as aforesaid dying of such disease, or slaughtered on account thereof, shall be buried, if practicable, on the premises where it has died or been slaughtered, or (if this be not practicable) on some convenient place adjoining thereto; and if such animal be not buried with the skin, its skin shall be disinfected in such manner as the inspector of the district may direct.

5. Every person within any such district, on whose premises there shall be any animal so labouring under any such disease and disinfect such premises in such manner as the inspector of such district shall direct.

6. Every person offending against this order shall for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, which the justices before whom he or she shall be convicted may think fit to impose by the fine.

The second order extends the powers exercised by the Privy Council, under the above Act, throughout all parts of England and Wales. It is comprised in the order dated July 24, applicable to the city of London and the Metropolitan Police district, and enacts:—

If at the date of the publication of this order in the London Gazette there shall be any animal labouring under any such disorder in the possession or custody of any cowkeeper, dairyman or dairywoman, or of any milkman or milkwoman, or keeping any cowhouse, shed, or building, or milking, or farmer, or person in possession of cattle, whatsoever, within those parts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or if at any time hereafter, while this present order shall continue to force and unrevoked, any animal shall be found labouring under any such disorder in the possession or custody of any such person as aforesaid, such person shall not knowingly cause or suffer to be found labouring or suffering under, any such disorder, notice of the existence of such disorder, or the appearance of such disorder in or among the animals belonging to, or in the custody of, any such person as aforesaid, shall immediately be given to some person to whom such animal or animals or custody such diseased animals or animal shall be, if such person shall reside within any superintendent, to the mayor or other principal officer of the corporation, or if elsewhere, to the clerk of the justices acting in and for the petty sessional division in which such person shall reside, or to the coroner, in which he resides; and, upon receipt of such notice, or upon any such disorder coming to the knowledge of any such officer, he shall cause public his or their jurisdiction respectively, it shall be lawful for the mayor or other principal officer, and for the said justices, if he or they shall think fit, from time to time, by writing under the common seal of the city or borough qualified to be an inspector, for the purpose of carrying into effect the following rules and regulations, one veterinary surgeon or more, or other persons, as he or for which he shall have been appointed, and the same authority may, from time to time, remove any such inspector.

The remaining provisions of the order are the same as those enabodied in the document given above.

The expenses of courts of justice in the year ended the 31st of March last was £671,778.

From a recently issued Parliamentary volume it appears that the expenditure of the public money in interest and management of the public debt was £28,026,000 in the financial year ended 31st of March last, £27,118.

A reduction of postage has taken place on letters for Denmark and Norway forwarded via Prussia, and in future the following rates will be charged:—Not exceeding ½ oz., 1d.; not exceeding 1 oz., 2d.; not exceeding 2 oz., 3d.; not exceeding 3 oz., 4d.; not exceeding 4 oz., 5d.; not exceeding 5 oz., 6d.; not exceeding 6 oz., 7d.; not exceeding 7 oz., 8d.; not exceeding 8 oz., 9d.; not exceeding 9 oz., 10d.; not exceeding 10 oz., 11d.; not exceeding 11 oz., 12d.; not exceeding 12 oz., 13d.; every additional ounce, 1d. The postage may be either paid in advance or left unpaid, at the option of the writer. Unpaid letters for the sender; but unpaid or insufficiently-paid letters will be charged on delivery with an additional rate for letters not exceeding ½ oz. or under in weight, and so on, according to the above scales.

A case of some interest in the metropolitan public has been decided before the Civil Tribunal of Paris. Viscount de Borelli, during the performance of his piece, Le Fils de Famille, at the Gaîté, on the night of the 31st May, 1867, but on arriving at the theatre found the place already occupied, the seat he had engaged having been given to a lady. The manager was offered another stall, or even a box, in place of that to which he was entitled, but refused to accept any compensation, and left the theatre indignant and subsequently summoned the manager and the director for damages. The Court, while admitting that every effort had been made to repair an involuntary error, nevertheless held that a person entitled to a seat at a place has previously hired, is be entitled to a compensation, and consequently condemned M. Calmette and Perrin to pay 50f. damages and costs.

The number of people who get into Chancery in a year is considerable, and it has been the misfortune of many to linger in that element. The clerks of records and writs report that last year there were 520 suits instituted by bill or information, and administration and other originating summonses bring the number to 1969, which is almost precisely the average of the previous five years. The Chief Clerk of Chancery reports 1529 attendable petitions; and the secretary at the Rolls 839 petitions and down 210 petitions under the Trustee Act, and 100 petitions for pauper in cases. The Gazette heard in the course of the year 2969 causes in some stage or other, and 1969 were set down for hearing. There were 1969 causes standing for hearing at the end of the year than at the beginning. 2969 orders were made by the Court of Chancery in causes and matters, and 1969 were drawn up and passed. The registrars' certificates were 1969; the number of decrees and orders made at Chambers 1969; 1969 files and other matters were directed to be filed by the registrars and other officers. The value of the business done at "Chambers" may be formed from an item in the returns, showing that 1969 orders, decrees, and other proceedings, or otherwise, were disposed of in the year; 814 sales of estates were made under orders of the Court, 1969 of which were sold by auction. By the Land Tax Duties Act, the Master of the Rolls 154, the three Vice-Chancellors 166, 167, and 169 days respectively, and a total of 561 days, being 392 days more than in the preceding year. The money and securities brought into Court exceeded the large sum of £1,969,000, and the money paid out £1,969,000 the amount taken out of Court. 7169 bills of costs were taxed, amounting together to £1,969.

We read in the Toronto Globe:—"The disproportion of numbers in the sexes is a remarkable feature of all the new settlements of the west has often been commented upon, and a large amount of gratuitous and unnecessary pity has been from time to time bestowed on the excessive female population of eastern districts in reference to emigration. One of the results of the late war has been to remove this cause of regret. The preponderance of single ladies in the eastern districts has not been lessened by the war, and the attention of social economists has been directed to the fact that there is a large number of widows who have begun to procure a comfortable living and avoid becoming burdens to the neighbourhoods in which they reside by keeping boarding-houses. Many of these establishments are kept by widows who have lost husbands in the late

THE DUBLIN INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

"SHE GOAT AND KID."

THIS group (named somewhat vaguely in the catalogue "Group of Two Goats"), by the sculptor Signor G. Lombardi, of Rome, appears to be an object of curious interest to most spectators on account chiefly of the elaborate painstaking and the dextrous chiselling (for which Italian sculptors are so remarkable) displayed in the rendering of the hairy coats of the animals. But the group must be credited with higher merit than can attach to merely careful and skilful handling. The underlying forms of the animals are most knowingly and truthfully indicated; and their actions are very spirited and characteristic—the mother rearing herself with the maternal instinct of defending her offspring, and the little kid, unconscious of danger, seeking the source of its natural aliment. At the same time, it may well be doubted whether the subject, taken alone, is either worthy of or suited to the material. Would not some more facile means or material render all that we have here, or that is worthy of being rendered in such a subject, with one tenth the labour? On account of the brittleness of the marble, the sculptor is obliged to resort to the always clumsy expedient of sustaining the goat by a meaningless pedestal of rock under its chest. But, what is more essentially contrary to the principles of true art is the sense of painful toil and lavished skill—with, after all, an inadequate result—which is conveyed by the attempt to realise in the rigid material of marble the flow and lightness of hair. The bas-relief on the pedestal of the group is pretty and appropriate enough to the pastoral subject; it consists of pandean pipes and oaten reed, bird's-nest and young, rose and bud, and twining convolvulus.

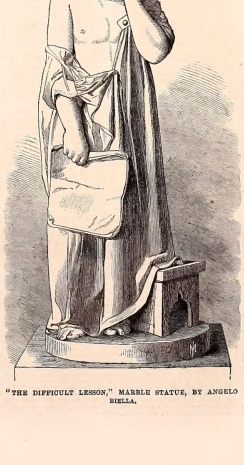
SÈVRES VASES.



THE French are, strange to say, proportionately more poorly represented in the fine-art department of the Exhibition than any other foreign nation. In the department of art-manufactures and industry, on the contrary, they make the best display of any but British contributors. And to the French has, with very proper courtesy, been assigned the most conspicuous portion of the Exhibition building—a privilege which our allies have not forgotten to turn to the best advantage, by that taste in arrangement for which, wherever an opportunity for its display is presented, they are always remarkable. The French contributions occupy the large semicircular space projecting from the centre of the nave of the glass structure into the garden, and which forms, as it were, an apse to the permanent hall of sculpture as the hall debouches at right angles into the nave. In the middle of this prominent and advantageous position are effectively disposed the objects sent by the Emperor from the Imperial manufactories of Sèvres china and Gobelins tapestry; and these, we need hardly say, form the most beautiful and interesting portion of the French collections. Among the Sèvres china there are examples which—although we may be fairly considered to be surpassing the French in ceramics generally (and also glass manufacture)—still remain hardly rivalled. From several almost matchless vases we have selected two of the largest size, and the most artistic for engraving. One of these, with ormoulu handles, called a "carafe" by the French, is Etruscan in form, and its decorative paintings on a violet ground are Renaissance in style, consisting of a figure of "Spring," with natural flowers and conventionalised foliage. The price is 4000*l.*, about £160. The other vase (one of a pair) is of a form called "Bertin" in France, but that is really of Oriental origin, as is its imitation "celadon," or pale sea-green ground, and, to a certain extent, the character of the ornamentation. The last consists of wild ducks, natural fircones, and hops. But the peculiarity of this decoration is that it is formed with applied white paste, in slight relief. There is, besides, on the Sèvres stands, a large fountain, with a group of two boys in imitation majolica; together with a magnificent pair of Mazarel vases, decorated on a deep green ground, with figures and ornaments in blue, gold, and bronze; a fine Coupe d'Amour, encircled with foliage and amorini in high relief; a Coupe d'Urbino, with delicate paintings on a white ground; imitations of Palissy ware, and old Sèvres, not to speak of dishes, plates, and services innumerable. We may add that, although the specimens of Gobelins tapestry do not equal in importance those exhibited in London in '62, yet the moderate-sized imitations of the Boucher and Watteau school which they comprise are fully as well adapted to exemplify the wonderful purity and truth of colouring for which this celebrated manufacture remains wholly unapproached.

"THE DIFFICULT LESSON."

LITTLE need be said of this statue, by Signor A. Bielia, of Milan, unless, perhaps, in justice to the sculptor, we say that, although the subject is humble enough, the execution is very respectable and the forms true to nature. Every mother, we are sure, and everybody else whose heart is in the right place, will (forgetting, probably, all theories about the dignity of sculpture) sympathise with the distress of this little one as she rests in despair from the stool on which she has been sitting poring over that "dog's-eared" lesson-book, and, heedless of her unbuttoned pinafore, is ready almost to tear her hair, preliminary, we fear, to a piteous burst of crying. We should say that the statue is called in the catalogue "The Sulky Child," but it seems to us that the title we have given it, following the Stereoscopic Company, better expresses the artist's intention, and should be nearer the original Italian—what that is we cannot learn.

"THE DIFFICULT LESSON," MARBLE STATUE, BY ANGELO BIELLA.

"A GILLIE AND HOUND."

A SUBJECT somewhat similar to that of this group has commended itself for treatment to one of our greatest sculptors. We allude to Mr. Gibson's "Hunter." That, however, is a work in the classical style, representing a nude young man, standing over and about to let slip from the leash a dog eager for the chase. The group before us is in what sculptors call the romantic or naturalistic style. It is not the first time Mr. Munro has been tempted to deal with a composition resembling this in its elements. Two or three years ago we engraved from the Royal Academy a similar group (which is also in this Exhibition), called "Young Romilly," an illustration of the poem by Wordsworth, entitled "The Force of Prayer," and founded on the tradition of the youth, who, in leaping the famous Yorkshire "strid," was checked by his dog, and fell into the "strangling arms of Wharf," and whose mother found in prayer and in the erection of Bolton Priory the only consolation for his loss. The composition before us, however, of a young, barelegged gillie, in the jacket and short kilt of the Highlands, holding in a great stag-hound, as the pair swiftly yet stealthily advance, eyeing the game and waiting only for the crack of the rifle and the signal for pursuit. This composition is a considerable variation, not only as regards the character of the youth and hound, but also as regards the action of both; and a different idea had, of course, to be expressed. Of the spirit and animation with which the sculptor has treated his theme, and the suggestiveness of movement in both figures, our Engraving may give an idea. We will only add a word on "the handling" of the dog's coat and the chiselling and undercutting of the fern, foxglover, and thick undergrowth through which this sporting couple are struggling. These portions, then, are indicated rather than imitated with the minute precision of the Italians. But this, we think—if such textures and objects are to be admitted at all as proper for representation in marble—is the proper limit for representation. To attempt to suggest more than the general "look of the thing" is almost certain to convey an impression of labour and of the inadequacy of the material, so true is the paradox in art that "a part is often greater than the whole."

"GILLIE AND HOUND," MARBLE GROUP, BY A. MUNRO.

BRONZE TIMEPIECE, WITH FIGURES.

BRONZE TIMEPIECE, WITH FIGURES.

Among the many bronzes in the Exhibition there is none more quaint and meritorious, in its way, than the group on the timepiece, in the Belgian department, exhibited by M. Bogaerts, of Antwerp, engraved below. There is here no weak attempt (such as we often see) to obviously associate the figures with the clock; they are apparently placed quite arbitrarily over it. We simply have a burgher and his wife of the fifteenth century—dressed in the Oriental silks and rich stuffs for which Ghent, Bruges, and Antwerp had become the great northern emporia —looking with interest from a balcony such as may still be seen over the porch or before the windows of some old Flemish buildings. But Albert Durer in carving, and Van Eyck and Memling, with that modern-medieval Fleming, Henri Leys, in painting, could hardly have given us two figures more true to the period, as far as regards character and costume, than this very lifelike and well-modelled group; while Quentin Matsys himself might have turned out the hammered-iron railing, so cleverly imitated in bronze. Truly, nothing proves the national vitality of the Belgian school more than to find such art as this in a common chimney ornament.

We may add that, although Belgian industry is but sparingly represented, there are, on a stall adjoining that where is the bronze we have engraved, samples of another description of art-manufacture of peculiar merit. We allude to the printed crockery-ware and porcelain exhibited by Messrs. Demoi and Son, of Brussels. The original designs, particularly of the Raphaelesque and mythological subjects, are exceedingly spirited and artistic; by the process of printing the very touch is perfectly reproduced; and the articles decorated may be sold at a remarkably low price.

CARVED PORTE-ARME.

This cabinet, or imitation antique "buffet," exhibited in the semicircular space of the French department, is one of the very finest examples of decorative furniture in the Exhibition. It was designed as a receptacle for arms, or armoury, or, as the French have it, a "porte-arme." The glass cases of the upper portion, as well as serving to preserve from rust and dampness, swords, and other weapons that may be placed within, would of course allow them to be seen, and in being seen the highly decorative effect of a group of choice arms would contribute greatly to the richness of the ensemble. The plain portion of this piece is oak; the carved details are in walnut. The style is Renaissance, and we must express our warm admiration of the harmonious design, and especially of the way in which the principles of continuity and repetition have been observed throughout. The carving is bold where a supporting and structural member had to be emphasised, and exquisitely delicate where only a flat panel had to be ornamented. It deserves to be instanced as a model of skilled workmanship as well as design. It has already figured in the exhibition held at Bayonne some time since, and is exhibited at Dublin by Messrs. Carlhian and Corbière, as agents for the manufacturer, M. Legias Maurice, of Nantes.

THE OPENING OF THE TUMULI AT CASTLE HOWARD.—For several days careful examinations have been made, in continuation of those adopted last autumn, of the British burial mounds situate on the Earl of Carlisle's estate at Castle Howard, with a view to the illustration of the modes of burial of the pre-historic tribes who inhabited the Brigantian territory. As was the case last year, the excavations were under the direction of the Rev. William Greenwell, Canon of Durham and vice-president of the Surtees Society. A large number of burial mounds have been opened, all proving to be round barrows of the cremation age, but exhibiting peculiarities indicating various modes of burial to have been practised by the successive generations of Britons who entrenched the escarpments of the Howardian range at the foot of which their graves are so profusely scattered. The first barrow undertaken was on Hall-moor. It was 57 ft. in diameter, and 4½ ft. high, and was built of sand and loam. A 14-ft. trench was cut through the tumulus from the south, but nothing was found till reaching the centre, where, on the plain, the deposit of burned bones was found, simply laid on the surface, without any accompaniments, and the mound reared over charcoal from it. This was no urn of any kind, nor any flint implement. Excavations, east and west, showed that this simple burial was the only one made in the barrow. There were no traces of burning, and it would seem that the body had been consumed elsewhere, and the charred bones gathered together for interment. The second excavation was made in one of the very large barrows opened last year, and from which, placed upon a large concreted base, a very beautifully pectinated urn was taken, together with a fine thumb flint. In digging eastward, and partly reworking the ground of last year, another very fine thumb flint was discovered very nearly at the site where the cinerary urn and bones were found. The third barrow opened was one of a series of low ones, possibly much reduced by cultivation of the land at various times, placed on the summits of the natural knolls, every one of which, it is believed, has its separate burial upon it. This barrow was west of the two others in the adjoining "Guy's Hole," or "Cook's Moor," and was 18 ft. diameter and 2 ft. high, being formed of sandy loam. In the centre a circular hollow, 3 ft. in diameter, had been sunk into the natural ground to the depth of a foot. This contained the fragments of the burned body, very much scattered; and the whole hollow was filled up with blurred earth and charcoal, and the sides of the hollow were very much burned. The inference is that the hole had been first made in the ground, and then the body burned in it, the mound being thrown over all. On the natural surface of the ground, and 5 ft. south-east of the hollow, a small and perfectly plain rudely-made cinerary urn was found, bottom upwards, surrounded by a considerable quantity of charcoal. The urn was empty, and crushed by the earth, but all the fragments were recovered. The fourth opening was made in a similarly placed low round barrow further west, formed of sand and ordinary soil, 16 ft. in diameter and 1 ft. high. In the centre of the barrow and on the natural surface there was a deposit of burned bones, charcoal, and some description of cement, the whole being compressed into a hard substance, resembling a mass of solid concrete. The mass was with difficulty broken, and, with a view of determining the composition of the plastic material, Mr. Greenwell took some portions for analysis. This was a novelty. There was no flint, nor any urn, and not much sign of burning. An opening was also made in a tumulus, 32 ft. in diameter and 3½ ft. high, in the same vicinity. The researches will be continued.

There was a review, on Wednesday week, at the Curragh, in presence of the Irish Commander-in-Chief, Sir Hugh Rose. General Bailey had charge of the troops. A short table was provided for refreshments.

The Chatham division of Royal Marines had a field-day drill on the Great Lines, on Thursday week, under the command of Colonel Hayes Marriott, the senior Colonel-Commandant; that of the Portsmouth division, about 100 bayonets, and executed a number of manœuvres.

The Himalaya has screw troop-ship, Captain T. Lethbridge, arrived at Portsmouth, last Saturday, from Quebec, with the 62nd Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Bell, C.B., and the following officers of Major B. F. Harrison, Captains Wilbury, Hunt, Dumaresq, Morson, and Armstrong; Lieutenants Crowther, Knowles, Atkinson, Hall, Bell, Hall, Thackray, and Smith; Ensigns Foster, Burne, Edwards, Ward, Burton, and Wright; Paymaster Pearson, Quartermaster Gaynor, Lieutenant and Adjutant G. H. Kinahan, Surgeon Hanbury, 47 sergeants, 17 drummers, and 471 rank and file. The Himalaya also brought home the head-quarters of the 109th regiment. The Himalaya also brings home 100 invalids from Malta: Major Lumsden, 1st battalion, 7th Regiment; Captain Hall, 69th Regiment; Surgeon Fairfield, 2nd battalion, Rifle Brigade; 18 sergeants, 3 drummers, and 79 rank and file. The invalids for Belfast, Nigg, and 77 time-expired men, 16 women, and 22 children belonging to different regiments.

The steam troop-ship Hydaspes, chartered by the Government for the conveyance of reinforcements to the garrison of Gibraltar, with troops from Government-quay, Gravesend, yesterday week:—Lieutenant-Colonel G. H. Bellairs, Captain J. E. B. Keane, Lieutenant W. Hall, Lieutenant W. W. Murdoch, Lieutenant W. A. Roberts, Assistant Surgeon R. Cufford, 14 non-commissioned officers, 2 women, and 3 children, wives and children of the 4 Battery A Brigade Royal Horse Artillery; Captain C. L. Tremayne, Lieutenant G. F. W. Morrison, Lieutenant and Adjutant A. Pevior, Assistant Surgeon W. Tanner, Veterinary Surgeon C. G. H. Bailey, 146 non-commissioned officers and men, 6 women, and 8 children of the B Battery; a Brigade Royal Horse Artillery: Colonel the Hon. R. Bourke, Lieutenant G. S. Harvey, Lieutenant and Adjutant H. Fraser, Assistant Surgeon A. Chesher, Veterinary Surgeon B. W. Major-General Lord Clarence Paget, Adjutant-General of Cavalry, has finished an inspection of the cavalry regiments at Aldershott, those being the last in the Southern District. However, the 14th (King's) Hussars (the Royal Irish) Hussars. The regiments were put through the customary manœuvres, which were performed very efficiently. The inspection concluded much pleased with the soldier-like and clean appearance of the regiment on parade. Lord Lucan frequently mentioned the improvement in the men's drill, and said he was highly satisfied with the manœuvres of the regiment in skirmishing. The troops of Artillery attached to the brigade, Lieutenant-General Sir John Pennefather, K.C.B., had a field-day on Wednesday week. They were formed up in two lines, with a strong body of contiguous columns, at ten o'clock, supplied with ten rounds of ammunition per man, and marched to the ground selected for the attack. The movements seemed to imply that the enemy were retiring from the north-west. After preparations had been made to dispose for action, the mounted troops were directed to be in front, and the infantry in the rear, to march past. This over, the enemy was discovered strongly posted in Pickley-copse, and a series of manœuvres were gone through with considerable skill. This proved a work of some difficulty, and for a considerable time the battle seemed to hang in favour of success. At length the enemy, out-manœuvred on all sides, was thrown into confusion, and the cavalry completed the discomfiture by a succession of brilliant charges. The troops on the field were the 2nd and 7 batteries 9th Brigade, R.A.; D battery R.H.A.; 3rd, 9th, and 14th Hussars; 1st Battalion Grenadier Guards; 1st Battalion Coldstream Guards; 1st battalion 3rd Regiment; 1st battalion 57th Regiment; 1st battalion 61st Regiment; 1st battalion 71st Royal North British Fusiliers; 30th, 35th, 50th, and 98th regiments.—The 20th (Dorsetshire) Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Monro, C.B., marched from its quarters at Aldershott, on Thursday week, to the North Camp ranges of the South-Eastern Railway, where it encamped under the special train to Dover. The 4 battery 3 Brigade Royal Horse Artillery left Aldershott Garrison, on Tuesday, for Dorchester. The 3 battery 9 Brigade Royal Artillery left Aldershott Camp, on Thursday, for Hilsea.—The prizes for some of the best-kept gardens around the camp have been awarded. A silver medal has been given to Sergeant-Major Parker, 2 battery 9th Brigade, R.A., for the greatest improvement; to Sergeant Smith, married to Corporal Price, 50th Regiment, for the most attractive flowergarden.

DEPARTURE OF THE CHANNEL SQUADRON FOR CHERBOURG.

The Channel squadron, Commander-in-Chief Sir Alexander Milne, Monday morning, for Cherbourg, with the Duke of Somerset, K.G. (Post Lord), Admiral Hon. F. W. Grey, K.C.B., and Admiral Hon. Keith Stewart Fanshawe, Lords of the Admiralty; Captain Hall, Secretary to the First Lord; the Earl of Lucan, Lord and Lady Rivers, Lord Alfred Paget, Lord Mayor, Chief Commissioner of Police. On leaving the harbour the Admiralty flag received the customary salute from the Admiralty Pier, Dover. The Enchantress, Admiralty yacht, Staff-Commander Petley, with Lord Clanricarde, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Stanley of Alderley, Lord Chichester, Colonel the Hon. Keith Fitz Gerald, Captain Hon. F. Pelham, Commander Paul, conveyed the new Secretary of State for War, the Right Hon. Sir Sydney Herbert, Bart., Sir Frederick Smith, Assistant Secretary, Sir Thomas Fremantle Lockyer, Bart., the Surgitity, steam tender, Admiralty Superintendent of Steam Machinery, Sir Baldwin Walker, Bart., and Mr. Rendel, Engineer-in-Chief. Also, carrying the Admiralty seals and mace, Mr. Thomas Bilton Sandwith, Captain Henderson, also left the harbour about eleven, having been appropriately saluted by all naval and other officers. The Admiralty steam barge-ship, Captain Herbert, left Spithead on Monday for Cherbourg.

The Channel squadron left Portland Harbour, Weymouth, on Sunday evening. The vessels of the Channel squadron, under the command of Sir Alexander Milne, K.C.B., are the Royal Sovereign, 3, flagship, Captain Hon. Edgar, C.B., Captain Hon. Geoffrey T. R. Hotham; Achilles, 20, steam-frigate, Captain Richard W. Vansittart; Black Prince, 41, frigate, Captain Hon. Frederick H. Kerr; Defence, 16, armour-plated steam-frigate, Captain Prince Consort, 91, frontal, Captain George O. Willes, C.B.; Hector, 24, ironclad, Captain Arthur W. Peyton; Revenge, C.B.; Resource, 6, steam-sloop, Captain Wilmshurst; Liverpool, 26, screw wooden frigate, Captain Rowley Lambert; Octavia, 16, screw wooden sloop, Captain Hon. Arthur E. Gough-Calthorpe; Falcon, screw wooden frigate, Captain Edward K. Barnard; Trincomalee, gun-boat, Captain Hon. Arthur Duncombe; Wrangler, gun-boat, Commander Hon. Henry St. George. Sir Alexander was the first off; she was followed, in fine line, by the Achilles, Prince Consort, Hector, Black Prince, and Resource, which formed the first division, and was followed by the second division, Revenge and Constance, all being under plain sail, the rear being brought up by the Triarius and Wrangler, under steam. After rounding the breakwater, the fleet were divided into two divisions, all of them being under plain sail; the irondclads to leeward, and the rest of the fleet to windward. The departure of the fleet was witnessed by hundreds of people, the "Lord-out" and the "Notice" flags being hoisted on the Admiralty Pier.

It is announced that the French fleet will arrive at Spithead on the 26th inst., and that their stay will extend to the end of September, during which time the flag officers will be entertained on board the Osborne by the Duke of Somerset, as first Lord of the Admiralty. General invitations will be issued for a dinner at the Port Admiral's, and also on board the Duke of Wellington. A review of the troops will take place on Southsea-common, on the evening of which day the French officers will be the guests of Lieutenant-General Sir G. Pauler, and a banquet on a grand scale, to be followed by a ball from the Mayor, Town Council, and inhabitants of the borough generally, will probably close the festivities.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The following official circular with reference to the rules to be observed at review and field-days, &c., by officers commanding artillery volunteers to whom guns of position have been issued, has just been promulgated from the War Office, by order of Colonel Reeder, C.B., the Inspector-General of Volunteers:—"On these occasions a battery of position should consist of four guns, and a half-battery of two guns. The number in each battery, as the case may be, should be provided with the following number of artillerymen, viz., for a battery of four guns, 1 sergeant-major, 1 bugler, 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 1 shoeing-smith, 1 collar-maker, 1 trumpeter, and 24 for the issue of ammunition, stores, provisions for the men, and forage for the horses for the day. This staff to be under the non-military volunteer to do with the drill of the battery, or the working of the pieces in action. 3. One officer per gun, who is to command the detachment, and will be held responsible for the working of the gun and the safety of his men. 4. Two non-commissioned officers, one to act as sergeant-major, and one to act as battery sergeant, the other assists the executive officer. 5. A farrier or shoeing-smith. 6. Two corporals to act as gunners, and to be responsible for the laying of the guns, under the direct the non-commissioned officer acting as battery sergeant-major. 7. One bugler, who will take charge of the drivers, the timber, and the ammunition waggons. 8. Two trumpeters to act as orderly men for the commanding officer, and the officers in charge of the guns. The use of the bugle or trumpet during the movements of the battery is not to be permitted."

The Marquis of Donegall, Lieutenant-Colonel commanding the 4th (Co. Antrim) battalion of the Queen's (north-east) Regiment, under which the new Irish National supply is to be contested from the English, Irish, and Scottish volunteers, has offered a challenge cup, to be competed for by eight of the best shots, to be chosen from each of English, Scotch, and Irish corps commanded by the Irish Inspector-General. The Irish Inspector-General of the Irish regiment in London is considered eligible to shoot; the match to be rifle-shooting, at distances 200, 500, and 600 yards, in the order of Position, Rhythm; distances, 200, 500, and 600 yards, by shots at each range; the competitors to be selected by the Inspector-General, and to be of the Queen's National Enfield match. The trophy, if won by England, to be open; if by Scotland, to be held by the Scotch Volunteer Corps of Edinburgh; if by Ireland, in the hands of the Irish Corps of Belfast. The match to take place in Ireland, in the grounds of the Lord Mayor of Dublin for the time being; if by Ireland, in the charge of the Lord Mayor of Dublin for the time being; if by Scotland, in the charge of the Lord Provost of Edinburgh for the time being, and at the foot of the trophy for that purpose. The gentleman making the highest aggregate of points to receive a prize of the value of £10, or £20 in money, as he pleases. In other respects, the rules regulating this match to be the same as those governing the Queen's National Rifle Association Trophy. Power reserved to amend or alter the rules.

The Duke of Cambridge has graciously accepted in Regent's Park by Colonel Wright. Originally combined with the 6th Tower Hamlets Rifle Volunteers, it is the last unit of the Metropolitan corps which has given it a separate establishment, and make it a battalion by itself. The wisdom of the step has been fully justified by the rapid increase of members since the accession of strength to the ranks. The enrolled strength of the battalion now exceeds 1,000 men. The Duke of Cambridge on inspecting the regiment highly addressed the regiment, complimenting them on the steadiness and correctness of their movements, and on the soldierly appearance they presented, as should make a favourable report to the War Office.

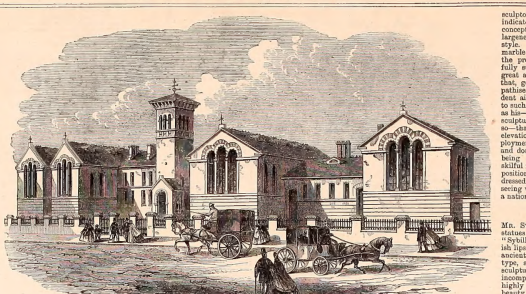
The Duke of Cambridge, Colonel of the Queen Mary's company of the London Scottish (No. 7) took place recently at the Wimbledon ranges, when the prizes were shot for and subsequently distributed to the successful scorers. Among the competitors were some of the best-known rifle shots in the metropolis, and the scores made were consequently of high character in the competitions here, but have distinguished themselves at gatherings like the present. Private Ferguson, No. 1 company, was the winner of the Duke of Cambridge's prize, and the highest aggregate score

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LADY CAROLINE WOOD.

This lady, who died on the 16th inst., at Littleton, the seat of the Woods in Middlesex, near Chertsey, was second daughter of the Right Hon. Robert Stewart, first Marquis of Londonderry, by his second wife, Frances, eldest daughter of the illustrious Judge and Chancellor, Charles, first Earl Camden. She was born in 1793, and married, in 1814, Colonel Thomas Wood, younger son of Viscount Lumley, second Marquis of Londonderry, K.G., and nephew of the gallant General, Sir Charles William Stewart, K.G., third Marquis of Londonderry. Her husband was born on the 15th of June, 1781, and married, on Dec. 29, 1801, to Colonel Thomas Wood, of Littleton, Middlesex, and Gwernvaell, Denbighshire, who died on Jan. 26, 1840, by whom she had issue seven sons, of whom five survive her—viz., the present Major-General Thomas Wood, of Littleton and Gwernvaell, and of Middlecott, Castle, in the county of York, late M.P. for Middlesex; Charles Alexander Wood, Esq., of White Hall, Middlesex; Lieutenant-Colonel Edward Wood, R.A., R.C.B.; Major-General Robert Blucher Wood, C.B.; and George Wood, Esq., Lieutenant-Colonel in the Coldstream Guards, and Aide-de-camp to the Queen. Lady Caroline Wood was a sister-in-law to the late Lord Lyttelton, and both of historic note, and her six sisters, all, like herself, highly accomplished, formed a remarkable family. One of the sisters married the late Lord Canning, Lady Selina Kerr and the Dowager Viscountess Hardinge. The present Marquis of Londonderry and the present Earl Vane are Lady Caroline's nephews.

MAJOR-GENERAL VETCH.



Major-General Hamilton Vetch, of the Bengal Army, who died at Deeca, East Indies, on the 14th of June, and was buried with distinction for many years in the 64th Bengal Native Infantry, one of the regiments which eventually perished in Delhi. General Vetch was born in 1788, and entered the Bengal Europeans. During his long military career he was in constant active employment, and in 1824 was in the field against the Burmese, and was present in Burmese Territory at the time of which he recounted the medal. He also was in the Deegulpur in 1825-26, and captured a standard in the attack on the Jeswuntgurh Hill, and Seetrug Kotrian, in 1826, being a lieutenant and adjutant. His son, Captain-Colonel in 1859, a Colonel in 1861, and a Major-General Nov. 7, 1862.

JOSEPH PARKES, ESQ.

Joseph Parkes, Esq., was of note as an eminent solicitor and a stirring and ingenious Whig politician. He was born in Birmingham, in 1796, and was well known at Birmingham and afterwards in London as the Radical University; and Mr. Parkes, who took a great interest in him, devoted much time to the private education of a body of following them to which young Parkes originally adhered. His reading was in the widest range, and comprehended many works that the elite end of the town jostled. He adopted the progressive principles of Bentham, after having gone through a course of training of the highest kind, started in Birmingham, first as barrister, and afterwards in partnership with Mr. Solomon Bray, the first town clerk of the corporation of Birmingham. At the time of the Reform Bill Birmingham Political Union was the active agent in the movement. He did not originate the movement, but he was the active agent in the movement. He did not originate the movement, but he was the active agent in the movement. He did not originate the movement, but he

CORK DISTRICT MODEL SCHOOLS

THE Irish Board of National Education has caused a Model School for the Cork district to be established in that city. The situation, in Anglesea-street, is convenient and accessible from all parts. The building, shown in one of our Illustrations, was commenced in January, 1864, and finished this summer. The architect was Mr. J. H. Owen, and the work, according to his designs, was done by Mr. James Delvin, the contractor; Mr. P. Lynch being clerk of the works. The style of architecture is Italian, the materials are red and black bricks, with Portland stone dressings and sculptured capitals and limestone columns. The interior is divided into three compartments—namely, male, female, and infant schools—which are distinctly separated from each other. The entire length of the front line of the building is 251 ft., exclusive of yards or railings. A tower 60 ft. high rises in the centre, the upper story of which is intended as an observatory for the advanced classes of the male department. The boys' school is 60 ft. long by 30 ft. wide; the girls', 40 ft. by 30 ft. There is a maritime school, 40 ft. by 23 ft., with four class-rooms attached, with lavatory, cap-room, and court-room. The infants' school is 48 ft. long by 25 ft. wide, with one class-room, lavatory, cloak and bonnet room. To each school-room are attached large, airy sheds, with spacious play-grounds and every necessary accommodation.

"MINERVA REPRESSING THE WRATH OF ACHILLES."

THE group we engrave is by Mr. Leifchild, a sculptor who stands apart in virtue of the elevated aim and noble character of all he does. It is half bas-relief and in, we presume, a study for a larger work. The subject will be familiar to Homeric readers; yet we may, perhaps, be expected to recall the cause of

> Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring

and we cannot do so more concisely than by adapting part of the argument of the opening book of the "Iliad." In the siege of Troy, then, the Greeks, having sacked some of the neighbouring towns and taken thence two beautiful captives, Chryseis and Briseis, allotted the first to Agamemnon and the last to Achilles. Chryses, the father of Chryseis and a priest of Apollo, thereupon went to the Grecian camp to ransom her; but his request was refused and he was insolently dismissed by Agamemnon. The priest then entreated vengeance from his god, who inflicted a pestilence on the Greeks. Achilles thereat called a council, and encouraged Chalcas to declare the cause of this pestilence, which is attributed to the refusal of Chryseis. The King, being obliged to send back his captive, then enters into a furious altercation with Achilles, and threatens to seize the loving and beloved Briseis of the latter. Whereat Achilles' wrath is uncontrollable, and he is—as represented—on the point of drawing his sword and forcing his way through the Greeks to punish their haughty and tyrannical leader, when Minerva, "sent by the sister and the wife of Jove," descends, and, concealed from the rest of the assemblage by a sable cloud, seizes Achilles, and prevails upon him to be guided by reason, in the confidence that heavenly power will revenge the outrage put upon him. The analogy of the moral of the pagan poet with that of the wise Solomon in one of his proverbs is suggested by the very apposite maxim of Sacred Writ appended by the artist to the title

> "Wisdom is better than weapons of war."

The intention in the action of the figures forming the group will require no comment after the preceding notes. Achilles stands in an agony of suspense, his terrible blade almost unsheathed. The Goddess of Wisdom, alighting, holds his arm, and, while repressing his wrath, lifts her mantle in a manner symbolical of the cloud which veiled her presence from all but the favoured Pelides—the almost invincible warrior, the great Achilles. The deeper significance of the sculptor's theme is worthily indicated by the dignity of the conception and the singular largeness and grandeur of the style. We trust that in the marble work the artist will fulfil the promise here afforded, and fully sustain the "height of his great argument." We would add that, generally, we sincerely sympathise with Mr. Leifchild's evident aims and aspirations. It is to such self-sacrificing endeavours as his—for in the present state of sculpture patronage they must be so—that we should look for the elevation of the art from employment for mere portraiture and domestic decoration, and its being esteemed purely for its skilful manipulation, to its proper position as a teacher of truths addressed to a nation; and through seeing which truths ever before it a nation must be the better.

"DELILAH."

MR. STORY showed us in his statues of "Cleopatra" and the "Sybilla Libica" that the thick-ish lips and heavy features of the ancient Egyptian and African type, as preserved in Egyptian sculptures and paintings, are not incompatible with a grand and highly characteristic style of beauty. Assyrian remains present us with a type somewhat similar to that of ancient Egypt, but still more massive and strongly marked, and without the same tendency to negro forms. Mr. Fuller, the sculptor of the statue we have engraved, from the last Academy exhibition, and who is one of our most distinguished artists in Italy, has apparently assumed, and with reason, as we think, that the ancient Philistines were a cognate race with the peoples bordering the Euphrates, and has given to his "Delilah" an Oriental cast of physiognomy wholly distinct from that of the pure modern Bedouin. Like Mr. Story, he has also shown that this type may coexist with a kind of Doric, large-moulded, and, at the same time, sensual, yet crafty cruel kind of beauty, such as would befit, according to the conception the imagination naturally forms, that Philistine harlot who fascinated the mighty Samson and at length betrayed him into the power of those to whom he had given such abundant cause to hate him. But the chief merit of this statue seems to us to reside in the expression. It will be seen by the scissors fallen at her side, and the locks of hair at her feet and clutched in her hand, that the moment intended to be represented is that when Delilah is watching Samson being led away, writhing in his bonds, unable to liberate himself, and, when seeing which, feeling satisfied that she has at last deprived him of the mysterious source of his strength, she betrays in her malignant expression the treacherous cruelty of her savage nature. This dramatic conception the sculptor has wrought out with much power and ability.

THE DIARY OF THE CABLE.

Who has not read it? Whose pulse has not fluttered in unison with the vicissitudes which its brief story exhibits? Who has not uttered a deep-drawn sigh at its mournful close—a sigh, nevertheless, having in it none of that bitterness with which we bury dead hopes out of our sight? What "sensational novel" ever swayed our emotions to and fro as this simple record has had power to do? It has been truly said that "truth is stranger than fiction," and this diary vividly illustrates the remark. Seldom, perhaps, in the annals of civilisation has a mechanical experiment been more graphically described—certainly never has any involved in its issue results of higher importance. As an instance of scientific insight and accuracy it raises our admiration to the highest pitch. As representing a grand and all-but-successful struggle of art with stupendous and seemingly invincible obstacles, it has its passages of intensest excitement. But every step of the narrative carries along with it hopes and fears which regard ends of transcendent moment—the linking together, by a kind of mystical marriage-ring, the Eastern and Western Hemispheres; the bringing them into daily presence with each other; and the successful assimilation of the one to the other in all that relates to intercolonial converse, commerce, friendship, mutual progress. This was the "consummation devoutly to be wished," the near prospect of which kindled enthusiasm, as from both sides of the Atlantic the experiment was looked forward to; and it is this which, ever in the mind of the reader, imparts to the diary such a thrilling interest.

Well, the failure is one which prophesies success. It is disappointing, but not disheartening. It must needs be accounted as "accidental," but it has its reverse side. It has severely rebuked carelessness, but, in doing so, has promised to greater care all that is desired. The price is too precious to admit of its being given at random. It can be won by desert alone; but then desert will win it. The grand but unfortunate attempt has taught us that, in more senses than one, nothing is stronger than its weakest part. The shackles of the wire-rope to be used for lifting the submerged cable had not been made to bear the strain to which they were subjected, on the presumption, probably, that they would not be required for use. The utmost precaution was exercised in the construction and coiling of the cable, with the single exception that, in addition to a few wire ends were allowed to remain in the tanks. Everything was successful which had been duly prepared with a view to success—nothing gave way but that which previous celebration and testing might have forewarned of the necessity of giving way. Science was not at fault. Art was not at fault where it did its best. It has been proved to demonstration that the process of laying a perfect cable across the depths of the Atlantic is not only feasible, but easy of execution, if duly considered a certainty as any mechanical process whatsoever. Human intelligence has gone up to Nature a third time with its well-studied task, and a third time has been turned down—but this time with a consciousness that one grand flaw has been demonstrated, and that it was prevented from passing only by a slip or two which it can readily guard against in future. Hereafter there need be no perad venture in the undertaking.

After a studious perusal of the Journal, we are not able to draw up an account of the pros and cons affecting the late, and calculated, if suffered to remain as they are, to affect every future expedition. The facts of an assuring character are both numerous and decisive; those which explain the failure are, happily, few and remediable. The Great Eastern has proved to be thoroughly competent to her work—steady in her course, easily steered, not materially disabled by any changes of weather, and roomy enough to allow of the necessary machinery and to carry with safety the enormous indispensable amount of tonnage. The cable itself is a triumphant success, sufficiently strong to bear its own weight, of the right specific gravity, when fitted when laid to the precise bottom of the sea, of its core, and likely rather to improve than to lose its conductivity by deep submersion. The scientific skill of the electricians has been so perfected as to enable them instantly to detect a flaw, and to point out the spot a mile or so the place in the cable where it will be found. The cable may be safely hauled in when necessary until the fault has been found and rectified, and when the machinery for that purpose has been sufficiently tested. Improved as experience suggests will probably do its work with the utmost ease and regularity. Should the cable actually part, its submerged end may be picked up from any depth and lifted once more on board. All these requirements have been proved, by actual trial. Yet the expedition failed. The failure, however, was due to removable causes. Injury to the cable during the process of paying out more than three hundred miles from the same end, whether attributable to malicious design or to ignorant negligence, may be certainly avoided hereafter. The repair of that injury on the last occasion of its occurrence was frustrated simply by the fact that the machinery provided for such a contingency had been less scrupulously passed as sufficient than it would have been had it been foreseen that the moment was coming when the success or failure of the whole enterprise would depend upon it. That, also, will be guarded against hereafter. Balancing the known elements of success against the known elements of failure, we are warranted by reason in looking upon a Transatlantic cable as not merely a possibility or a lucky accident, but as a result lying as clearly within the limits of certainty as any human work that is yet future can be. We now know all that has to be provided, and that it can be provided, in order to realise the full extent of our wishes in regard to this matter. We see clearly the whole process by which this most splendid of projects may be converted into an accomplished fact. In missing our way, this time, we have discovered the true way for the next time. The problem is solved. Henceforth nothing remains to be conjectured. Simple obedience to known laws is all that is required.

The elements of success being such as we have attempted to indicate, we congratulate our readers on the fact that the enterprise of the scheme have resolved to test them once more by actual experiment. They have lost none of their confidence, nor has a particle of their courage oozed away. What might have been their final determination if the Great Eastern had returned immediately on the severance of the cable can be matter of conjecture only. In that case, possibly, the experiment would have been considered as one surrounded by too many risks to invite repetition, and years might have glided away before another attempt would be ventured upon. Happily, such was not the case. The men to whose conduct the emergency rise was intrusted exhausted all their resources before setting their faces homeward, and, in their efforts to recover the lost end of the cable, demonstrated the practicability both of finding and securing it. The most thrilling portions of the diary have proved also the most useful. They record successes just where they were least expected, marred by failures just where they may be surely provided against in future. The effect of the whole narrative, in illustrating, during its revising proof, and in inspiring confidence. The various telegraphic companies interested in the completion of the undertaking wisely conceded to resume operations forthwith. Their first direction was to manufacture a fresh supply of cable appliances and send back the Great Eastern in October to pick up the broken cable, splice it with what remained on board, and finish the work which accident had suspended. On consultation with Captain Anderson, it was found impossible for this plan a much new one. The machinery of the Great Eastern needs repairs, the completion of which would delay any resumption of the enterprise until the season was so far advanced as to endanger the issue. It has, therefore, been resolved to wait till May of next year. Meanwhile, a second cable is to be manufactured, which will be laid alongside of the first; and, should the effort succeed, as is confidently anticipated, it is proposed to lay down a third cable in continuance paying out the unexhausted portion of the old line at Newfoundland, make for the spot where the fracture occurred, pick up the broken cable, splice it with the new, in mid-position, and so provide the public with two lines instead of one. The details of this plan will very likely undergo some modification; but, in substance, it may be looked upon as adopted.

"Done but the hearty answer has been. Courage, patience, and perseverance are the qualities which Nature most regards in those who woo her. In the end, she evermore rewards them. That they have been and are being conspicuously displayed in the conduct of the present undertaking will not be denied; that they may ere long receive the prize for which they are striving will, we are sure, be the hearty prayer of all who yearn for the onward and upward progress of the human race.

THE BREAKING OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN.

The return of the Great Eastern, bringing news of the failure of the attempt to lay the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, the broken end of which was nearly picked up, and the cable itself successfully submerged between the shore end in Foilhummeran Bay, was announced last week; and the intelligence was fully confirmed by the arrival, on Monday, of Mr. W. H. Russell on board the Great Eastern, from Monday, July 24, to Friday, August 4. He has since been published. We are now in possession of a few more sketches by the same artist, Mr. Robert Dudley, who furnished us with the illustrations of the landing of the cable at Newfoundland in 1858, and accompanied the Great Eastern on her voyage last year, and who, having been permitted to accompany the expedition, was able to obtain the following sketches of the principal incidents in the exciting scenes of this memorable enterprise.

It may be remembered that on Saturday, July 22, after starting from the Irish coast, Wednesday, July 26, a fault in the electric insulation of the cable was discovered when 146 miles in length of it had been submerged in the wake of the ship was picked up again in mid-ocean by means of the fault. The cable was then in very deep water, and the fault was effectually cured. The cable had again to be raised and submerged, and the splice, with which the fault was made, was in 2000 fathoms water, 600 miles from Valencia, and 1028 miles from Newfoundland, when the fault was discovered. "Another fault, as it is called, had been discovered about one o'clock that afternoon, [Friday, July 28,] and preparations to make a second splice up machinery could be put in gear, the end of the cable was hauled in again over the bow. An inspection of the outer covering of the hemp covering an external wire, and, on unravelling the strands so as to expose the insulated wire, evidence of injury to the outer wire was found. Then the gutta-percha covering so as to project round the wire, when to the extent of the diameter of the cable; one half was sliced off, and the operation of splicing commenced. The splice was completed, and the operation of submerging the cable as it was passed along from the bows of the ship, when it rose to the surface. The line was then tested to prove the insulating and screwed conviction that such an injury was the work of some fiendish enemy. Every precaution was accordingly taken. Canning showed the cable and the stab to the cablemen, who admitted that the wound was inflicted by a sharp instrument. Search was made for the man who was in the watch when the cable was injured, being of the same gang as that which was on deck at the time the cable was first paid out. The cable, when transferred to different dailies on deck. The coachmen on board the ship formed a corps of supervisors, who undertook to watch the men in their several gangs. "We employed gave their suspicions." We may add that the passes of the gentlemen in the performance of the voluntary duty were Mr. Field, Captain Moriarty, Professor Thomson, Mr. Varley, Mr. R. Dudley, Mr. H. O'Neil, Mr. C. Bright, and Mr. John Pender. The watch was kept night and day for two hours at a time.

We take from Mr. Russell's journal, without abridgment, his account of the fault in the breaking of the cable, on Wednesday, the 26th, which in the first instance was discovered by the electricians, but which at one time was jointly called "a sad and unexpected event." The cable had proved right the night before, but the ship scarcely felt it, and went on paying out cable, without let or hindrance, at a rate of seven miles an hour. At 3.30 a.m. on the 26th the electricians discovered "the well-known and dreaded clear" from, in fact, 8 a.m., Greenwich time, or 4 minutes later than the previous observation, and, on signalling to the nearest series of currents to the shore, the galvanometer detected a flaw of electricity which instantly disappeared. The fault was reported to the locality, for the fault was very varying, but it was generally believed to be not far from the stern of the ship. While Mr. Clapp-Field was on watch in the tank, a little before the time of the accident, a grating noise was audible as the cable flew over the coil. One dent, a grating noise was audible as the cable flew over the coil. One of the experienced hands immediately said, "There is a piece of wire," and called to the look-out man above to pass the information aft, but no notice appears to have been taken for some time of the circumstance. After the ship had been stopped, and the remainder of the flaw in which the fault was supposed to have occurred had been paid out, a piece of wire was seen projecting out of the cable in the flaw, and, on one of the men taking it in his fingers and trying to bend it down, the wire broke short off. It was nearly 3 in. long, and evidently of hard, ill-tempered metal, which had worn out through the strands of the cable in the tank. The fault in the cable which had gone overboard might obviously have been caused by such a piece of wire, and there could be no doubt that the wire of the outer covering of the cable was capable of inflicting injury on the gutta-percha it was intended to protect. The discovery was in some measure due to the man's mind, because it showed that one certainly, and the second possibly, of the previous faults might have been the results of similar accident. It was remarked, however, that this fault occurred on the same watch as all the previous misfortunes had occurred.

"As the fault was too serious to be overlooked, and as there was a difficulty in detecting its situation, preparations were made to go the picking-up apparatus and buoy the cable. In doing so, two wires were made in the cable, the first near the old splice, between the main and the fore tank (tank 4 and 5 right); the second (or the one broken), which showed the fault to be in that portion of the cable which was afterwards. The wire was in the chain were now secured to the cable forward, which showed a maximum strain of 23½ cwt.; and at 3.30, Greenwich time, the cable was secured and went over the bow. At 4.30 a.m. Greenwich time, the cable was buoyed, and when the steam was got up it was found that there was not strength in the bollers, and so the picking-up gravel altogether for some time, during which the ship lay becalmed and chafed against the cable.

"Let the reader turn his face towards a window, and imagine that he is standing on the bows of the Great Eastern, and then, of course, on his right will be the paddle-box, and on his left the port side of the ship. In front, fixed in the bows, is a large V-shaped, as it is technically termed, with a semicircular cut out in the same kind on the stern aft each side, on which the cable is drawn as it is pulled up from the sea by the picking-up apparatus, and which is secured to strong chain diameter and down to the bows till it has passed the hooks and is coiled down aft in safety. There are at the bows of the Great Eastern two huge hawse-pipes, through which project two large iron tubes beyond the line of the stem. After two miles of cable had been picked up the Great Eastern was found to be in the vicinity of her engines because the steam failed, while her vast broadside was exposed to the wind, which was drifting her rapidly to leeward. On board the ship the engineers on oblique strain was brought to bear on the cable, which came up from the sea at the bow on the right-side. Against the side of the hawse-pipes the cable now caught on the left-hand side, while the ship kept drifting to leeward. The engines were stopped and steamed for a considerably against the bow, for now it was held by the projection, and did not drag from the V-shaped. The Great Eastern could not go down but the cable was dragged up, and, whilst under strain was very true is no power of steerage. At this critical moment, too, the cable did not go on to prevent it. It was difficult to keep clear of the ship up in the cable. As the cable then chafed so much that in two hours damage was done to the hempen sheath and the engines belonging to one of the hoops were passed down the bow over the cable and round the bow under the bilge-keel. They were landed so as to bring the cable, which had been caught on the left-hand side by the starboard hawse-pipe, to the right-hand side, and the ship still drifting to the left, while the cable, now drawn directly up from the sea to the V-shoot, was straining obliquely from the right to the shackle on the starboard bow. It was necessary to let this instead of veering away, as we were near the end of the cut of cable.

"The cable and the wire rope were now over the bow, and were thrown in the groove in the larger wheel, the cable being wound upon a drum behind the wheel. Communication across the engine-room and the wire rope being taken in round the capstan. But the rope and cable, as I have before described, were not coming up in a line, but were being hauled in, with a great strain on them, at an angle from the right hand side of the bow to the centre of the capstan and in the bow. They were wound round on it, slowly, and were passing over the wheel together. As the cable came part being taken when a jar was given to the dynamometer, which flew up from 0 cwt.—the highest point marked on the dynamometer—to 2½ in. It was again checked and wire rope clambered, as it were, up out of the groove on the right-hand side of the wheel, got on the top of the rim of the V-wheel, and rushed down with a crash on the smaller wheel, tearing no doubt, a great portion of the cable to which it was attached. The machinery was still in motion, the cable and the rope travelled altogether, one towards the capstan, the other towards the drum, when, just as the cable reached the dynamometer, it parted, fell into the bow, and with one bound leaped, as it were, into the sea."

This is the account of Mr. Robert Dudley's sketch, engraved on our front page. Mr. Canning, the chief engineer of the work, was standing close by. On the cable giving way, he said, "It is a good omen for any words to portray the dismay with which the sight was witnessed and the words were uttered. The instant the wire rope was let go, when a man came aft with the letter and still lashed to the chain, and we saw the tortured strands, torn from their natural core, in an encouragement to say that a strange feeling of pity, as though for some sentient creature mutilated and dragged asunder by brutal force, pervaded the hearts of the beholders. Not of what avail was sentimental abstraction, when instant, strenuous action was demanded? 'Alas! alas!' Here, according to Mr. Robert Dudley's sketch, engraved on our front page,

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Emperor and Empress have visited Arenenberg, on the shore of Lake Constance, once the residence of the Empress's mother, Queen Hortense. At Arenenberg many of his Majesty's early years were passed, and it was there, after his escape from Ham, that he took the last farewell of his mother. Their Majesties arrived at Strasbourg on Thursday week, and met with an enthusiastic reception. The following day during the morning their visit to Arenenberg was varied from various sources. The Emperor reached the Castle of Arenenberg between five and six o'clock on Friday evening, accompanied by the Empress and a suite of about thirty persons. A special train, accompanied by the Baden Grand Marshal, took these Royal visitors to the Lake of Constance, whence they drove, in six or seven hired carriages, to Arenenberg. Notwithstanding the rain, the inhabitants had assembled in numbers along the route. On reaching the castle the Emperor was received with a hastily-erected triumphal arch, bearing the inscription, "Force, prudence, and fidelity!" presented by the municipality. A fête was given on high, with a salute of cannon. His Majesty, on the other hand, was compelled to dispense with the customary cheers of "Vive l'Empereur!" and to content himself with the more but respectful greeting proper to Republicans. At the entrance of the park, where a still greater number of people had assembled, the travellers quitted their carriages and traversed the remainder of the distance to the castle on foot, and the Emperor greeted several of the bystanders whom he recognised with a hearty shake of the hands. The first visit paid by his Majesty with the Empress was to the castle chapel, which contains the statue of his mother, Queen Hortense, in white marble. Subsequently a select couple retired to partake of the hospitalities of the castle. On Sunday they took a trip on Lake Constance, and touched at Schaffhausen. Their Majesties passed Monday quietly at Arenenberg, and on Tuesday morning left for Interlaken, Thun, and Berne.

The Princes Imperial returned to Biarritz from the Pyrenées-Orientales.

The English fleet arrived at Brest on Monday morning, after lying off Jersey on account of damage sustained by two of the vessels. The fleet, greatly diminished by the return home of the Channel squadron, consisted of only the following:—Hero, Captain Hewlett, bearing the Admiral's flag, Commodore Hornby; Revenge, Captain Phillimore; Research, Captain Powell; Achilles, Captain Vansittart; Prince Consort, Captain Wilkes; Black Prince, Captain Lord V. Kerr; the yachts Enchantress and Enchantress, and the despatch-boats Lively and Tracochs—in all, one wooden two-decker, five iron-clad frigates, two yachts, and two despatch-boats, manned by 3,000 men. The Admiral, Count de la Gueronnière, and the Prefect of the Department, landed the English flag, went out some distance to meet the squadron. It was about seven o'clock in the evening when passing the Pierre lighthouse, left the passage called the Goulet and entered the harbour. The exchange of salutes then began, and the first shot was the signal for a general rush of the inhabitants to the cliffs.

A lady, known of late years as the Countess of Beauregard, but better known as Miss Howard, died at Beauregard, her country seat, near Versailles, on Saturday last, in the seventy-fourth year of her age.

Count Walewski, the Government candidate, has been chosen to represent the Marne in the Corps Législatif, in the room of M. Havin, the Opposition candidate, has been elected deputy for Lyon.

The long-looked-for examination of the papers found at the correspondence of Napoleon I. has commenced the distribution of the eighteenth volume, the first two portions of which are now on sale at Tuileries.

Rear-Admiral de la Grandière, Commander-in-Chief of the Cochin-China squadron, has been promoted to the rank of Vice-Admiral.

Count Gasparin, director of the arts and sciences, has received the grand cross of the Order of Frederick the Great of Prussia.

M. Berthenay, formerly Chef du Cabinet to M. Thouvenel, and now French Minister in China, has arrived at Pekin by the overland route from Pekin—that is, by the desert of Gobi, Khiachta, and Siberia.

From M. Dorny's speech at the Sorbonne, it appears that the number of free classes of superior instruction in Paris and some of the large communes is 800, while the number of young workmen who followed the evening classes in Paris in the year 1863 was 17,000. Of the former number, 14,341 learnt to read, 23,380 to write, 40,000 to cast accounts, and the rest to draw, model, and engrave in the course of four months. Only 6719 left the classes without having derived any advantage from them.

A new boulevard is to be opened in Paris from the Seine to Bagnolet, and another from the Quai de Javel to the Rue Lecourbe. Both of these boulevards are to be finished in 1867.

The spectacle of a bull-fight has been exhibited in the vast Roman amphitheatre at Nismes (Gard). Most of the spectators consisted of a proportion of whom were women—enjoyed the carnage for upwards of four hours. Five horses were engaged in the fight, and the lives of these latter were tortured with explosive darts, and then, when excited to a paroxysm of fury, dispatched with swords.

The Government is about to send out an engineer to Japan to establish an arsenal at Yokohama, on the model of that in Savoy.

The little unpleasantness between France and Panama arising out of the attack on the French Consulate, when the Spanish Envoy had taken refuge, in May last, has been amicably settled by the Government of Panama offering a satisfactory apology to the Emperor.

SPAIN.

The King's father is dead. His late Royal Highness Don Francisco de Paulo Antonio was the widower of Dona Maria Luisa Carlota, daughter of Prince L. King of the Two Sicilies, and died on the 10th of March, 1794. He leaves two sons—Don Francisco d'Assise, Convert of the Infanta Isabella; the Infanta Isabella, Queen of Spain; Duke of Seville, born on April 17, 1823, who espoused Dona Elena de Castellvi y Shelly, now deceased—and the Infanta Pilar.

A telegram dated Madrid, Aug. 21, reports that disturbances have taken place at Tudela, Uberuna, in Andalusia, and Cadiz, and that they were raised in favour of the Carlist party; but the authorities immediately took energetic measures for the suppression of the disturbance, and order was re-established.

The railway from Cordova to Malaga has been opened with great ceremony by the Minister of Public Works, the Governors of the two provinces, and other officials, in presence of a large number of spectators. Benediction was given by the Bishop of Cordova.

GREECE.

The Session of the National Assembly has been prolonged for forty days. The Minister of the Interior has resigned, and been replaced by M. Rumonidnos. M. Mavrocordato, President of the Council, is dead.

AUSTRIA AND PRUSSIA.

The Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia have had a meeting at Bohmen. The Emperor of Austria arrived on Wednesday, and was, we are informed, "most cordially met upon his arrival" by the Emperor, who had arrived there some days before. The interview immediately returned the Emperor's visit at the castle. Herr von Bismarck and Count Mensdorff, the respective Ministers for Foreign Affairs of previously, and "succeeded in coming to an understanding upon future basis." At an interview on the following day the King of Prussia sanctioned the points decided upon at Gastein relative to a new organisation of the provisional co-dominion of Prussia and Austria in the duchies, a convention was signed to that effect on the day on which the following are the points agreed upon:—

Prussia will have the administration of Holstein, and Austria that of Holstein.

The two great Powers will propose to the Federal Diet the establishment of a German fleet and the concession of Kiel into a Federal port. Until this is accomplished Prussia will undertake the command and furnish the police of Kiel, and will be empowered to fortify the port and guard it with Prussian troops.

Austria and Prussia will also propose to the Diet that Lauenburg be made a Federal fortress, and until this is decided Rendsburg will be garrisoned by Austrian and Prussian troops; the improvements to be subsequently incurred by each Power on the 1st of July of every year.

Prussia will retain two military and naval roads—namely, the Holstein portion of the road from Lubeck to Kiel, and from Hamburg to Rendsburg. On the completion the postal service will be carried on by Prussia, who will also establish her own telegraphic line between Kiel and Rendsburg.

The latter Power is authorised to construct the canal at Rattzeu, between the German Ocean and the Baltic, which will remain under Prussian control.

Austria will surrender to Prussia her claims to Lauenburg for a pecuniary indemnity, the duchy paying its portion of the Danish war expenses. The Prussian troops will evacuate Holstein, and the Austrian troops Schleswig, both the latter duchies will join the Confederation.

These articles, and also some other measures agreed upon at Gastein, among which is the question of the Federal Government and the treaty, will, it is expected, be carried out on the 15th of next month.

UNITED STATES.

A discussion has taken place in the Cabinet, at Washington, on the subject of mission reconstruction, and the President has expressed his determination to allow to the Legislature of each State to which Congress has directed.

The United Army is being shorn of its large proportions with marvellous rapidity. Since May last 700,000 men have been mustered out of the service, leaving on the pay-roll about 250,000.

At the late elections in Kentucky the Opposition voters are said to have been driven away from the polls by violence.

General Palmer, of Kentucky, had addressed to President Johnson a memorial against the abolition of the institution of slavery in Kentucky. He says that, in order to relieve the towns into which the negroes were flocking, he was obliged to grant them passes to cross the river into Ohio. The number of negroes who had passed through in eleven days left out of the 250,000 at the beginning of the war.

The municipal authorities in various localities are adopting measures to bring their claims to the suffrage before the people. A call for a national convention to settle the question has been adopted and circulated in South Eastern Virginia.

In Illinois a Republican convention has been held, at which resolutions were passed favourable to negro suffrage, and making the abolition of slavery a condition for the admission of the re-united States into the Union; also urging the prompt trial and punishment of Mr. Davis.

Provisional Governor Hamilton, of Texas, in a proclamation, admonishes the Texans to dispel the prevalent delusion that slavery still exists.

The Secession party in North Carolina are again raising their heads. Holding out the hand of fellowship to the Secessionists, they have lately proposed by them to fete the returned soldiers of the Confederate army, and compliments have been made for the same purpose at Raleigh. The authorities were, however, on the alert, and the festivities were forbidden.

The Shenandoah is still exciting the apprehensions of the Americans. In the Mercantile Gazette, one of the London papers that, as soon as the news of the termination of the war reached this country, instructions were dispatched to the Confederate cruisers not to take his ship into the account—to capture her and have her forthwith disarmed. Mr. Mason "presumes therefore, that her future cruise has been engaged."

A dreadful accident occurred on Lake Huron on the evening of the 9th inst. The steamboat Atlantic, from the Saginaw, collided with a vessel while running at full speed. The former vessel sunk almost instantly, carrying down with her between 150 and 200 passengers of these on board, numbering seventy-five persons, were rescued by the latter.

The caterpillar has appeared on several of the Louisiana plantations, "ravaging," says a New York telegram, "the destruction of the cotton crop."

The Sumner Twins write to the New York journals that they have been raised to the rank of Lieutenants in the exhibit thunderer once more, accompanied by several of their children.

OPENING OF THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT.

Lord Monck, Governor-General of British North America, went to the Chamber of the Legislative Council, in the Parliament Building, at Quebec, on the 8th inst. The members of the Legislative Council being ordered to the Legislative Assembly chamber, the members of the Legislative Assembly, and, that House being present, he opened the Fourth Session of the Eighth Provincial Parliament of Canada with the following speech from the Throne:—

Hon. Gentlemen of the Legislative Council, Gentlemen of the Assembly,—In conformity with the announcement which I made to you at the last Session of Parliament, I have visited England, and have had the honour of meeting there to confer with her Majesty's Government on questions of importance to the province. I am happy to inform you that they have been considered since after the return of the deputation, in order that you may receive the report of their mission, and that the Bill for the confederation of the British provinces of the last Session, was left unfinished. I have directed that the correspondence relating to these matters be laid before you for your consideration.

The disastrous termination of the civil war, which has for the last four years prevailed in the United States of America, has caused much suffering and loss to the commercial and industrial interests of this province; and we have to deplore the assassination of the late head of the Union and a considerable increasing development of friendly relations between our people and the citizens of the United States.

The circumstances which rendered it necessary to place a portion of the volunteer militia on active service during the present year have ceased to exist, the force has been reorganised, and I have to express my feeling of satisfaction at the readiness with which the militia generally, during the whole time, evinced a good conduct which they exhibited during the period of their service.

Gentlemen of the House of Assembly, I have directed that the estimates for the current year and the statement of expenditure, which has been incurred, chargeable on the revenue of the province, since the last Session of Parliament, be laid before you, and I rely on your cheerfully granting such sums as may be found sufficient for the public service.

Hon. Gentlemen of the Legislative Council, I have not failed to transmit to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, for presentation to her Majesty, the addresses to her Majesty which you passed during the last Session, and also the federal union of the colonies of British North America. I have desired that a copy of the Bill which was introduced into the Legislature may be laid, and I trust that mature examination of the project will, ere long, induce the Legislature of the other provinces to adopt the same course. I have the satisfaction to announce which has been adopted on a great feature of imperial policy, and which will, I trust, be productive of great benefit to the provinces from the Throne.

The following is the new Cabinet arrangement: Sir Narcisse Belleau, Premier and Receive-General; Hon. John A. Macdonald, Minister of Militia; and Hon. M'Dougall, Minister of Education.

INDIA.

By the overland mail we have Bombay papers to July 24. The Paris Constitutionnel says that the Secretary of State for War in India this reason, as far as can be judged, decidedly less than in recent years. The reinforcements sent to the Straits of Malacca, and with the intimation that, if its terms were not accepted, a British force would be dispatched to his capital. Very unfavourable accounts are given of the health of the troops in the Andaman Islands. The doings of the Brassins in Khelan continued to excite attention in Parsi and the Bombay Gazette in the meantime that the agents of the Cruz had made over the city of Khelaun to the King of Bokhara, remarks that the Russians have left Khelaun, and that the Khan, who are establishing cantonments and otherwise settling down there.

The Indian Government has appointed Mr. Lushington Director of Indian Telegraphs, and rejoined his corps—the Artillery. He is succeeded by Colonel C. G. Robinson, R.E., of the Survey Department.

A fatal cyclone has occurred in the district of Delhi, by which fifteen natives were severely burned, and two of them are since dead.

Major-General Outram has gained, by private contributions, a number of letters and documents relating to the fatal march from Meow, on the Jumna, to Cawnpore, which he intends to present, through the Government, their publication for general use was forbidden.

Several cases of the Bengal Famine Fund weather have taken place among the military in the Punjaub.

An important suit brought against the Government by the widow of the late Dyce Sombre and others to recover compensation for land and buildings taken for public purposes has just been heard at Delhi. The judgment is against the plaintiff on all the issues.

A disturbance has taken place on the north-west frontier, caused by a tribe, called the Adunanlies, giving refuge to Syed Ameer, the hostile emissary of the Akhound of Swat. The territories of the former have been ravaged by the latter.

Cholera is raging in Nursinpore and Sonepur, in Central India; and the latter district some villages are nearly depopulated.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The restorations which have been going on for a year past in the cathedral of Durham Cathedral are finished.

On Tuesday week the Archbishop of York held a Confirmation in Bilsdale parish, and consecrated a piece of ground given by Lord Feversham as the churchyard.

Yesterday week the pretty little chapel built by Miss Coutts Trotter at St. Germains, near Paris, was dedicated by the Bishop of Jamaica, in the presence of the Duke and Duchess de Bassano.

On Wednesday week the carpenters' workshops at King's College were destroyed by fire. The loss is estimated at somewhat exceeding a narrow escape, being only separated by a small passage.

At a special meeting of the Ancient Druidical Order of Queen's College, Birmingham—at which the Earl of Lichfield presided—the Rev. T. E. Espin, B.A., Fellow and Tutor of Lincoln College, Oxon, Vicar of Rudleigh, has been appointed Resident Warden.

Stanthorp Church has had a tenth stained window added to its decorations. It is by Ward and Hughes, and bears this inscription:—"In memory of Henry Parke—of Girton, who died Dec. 18, 1864, aged seventy-five, this window is placed by his sister, Augusta Mary Parke."

The nave of All Hallows Church, Pitmoglen, in Buckinghamshire, lately re-opened, was re-consecrated on the same occasion by the Bishop of Oxford. The chancel was also re-opened, having been restored under the superintendence of the Rev. W. E. Scobell, the Rector of Ditchley.

It is intended to add a transept and a vestry; the reredos, with the stone and the credence, being at present placed at the east end of the nave.

At the recent laying of the centre-stone of a new church at Chilton Buccaple with some dedicated to be erected at, by the patroness, Lady Colonel Bruce, M.P., the first of the names; and the other by the Rev. Mr. Bruce, the Rector of Chilton Buccaple. The church is to be of the religious order Decke—Gothic, which, it is stated, will be designed given by Mr. Wailes, a Leighton gentleman, who has restored the most chancel at the parish church.

A tender has been accepted from Mr. Bladwell for carrying out, under the direction of Mr. G. G. Scott, the grubbing of the roof of the nave in the Abbey Church, Dorchester, which has been in a state of decay, owing to the leaking of the roof and to fallen timber, for some years. The work is to be done for the sum of £2200. In order to preserve the ancient character of the work of restoration, look for increased help from the public. During the recent renovations, it was found that the timbers of the original roof were so much rotted in the west front was that it had no foundation to support it. It is now proposed to take down the whole of the west front, and to rebuild the reparation of the west front by the masonic body to consecrate.

On the 16th inst. the parish church of Cowley, near Oxford, was reopened by the Bishop of the diocese. The cost of the restoration, from designs by Mr. Street, will be defrayed by the Right Hon. Lord Jersey to the extent £700; the Bishop of St. Asaph £50; the Archbishop of Canterbury, £40; the Rev. Dr. Pusey, £30; the Rev. Mr. Bennett, £20; the Rev. Mr. Mackarness, £20; the Rev. T. Chamberlain, £20; the Rev. H. Randolph, of Marcham, £20; and the sum has been divided mainly to the beautiful reredos to the altar of which the marbles and alabaster are the gift of Mr. Thomas Combe, and to Sir Morton Glenbuckey left a legacy of £100, £50 of which will be devoted to a small organ, and the remainder to the restoration of the tower and the bench. The basis funds, however, have been received from the Rev. A. Barrow.

The following preferments and appointments in the gift of patronage have been made:—The Rev. J. O. Miller, Vicar of Tamworth and Rural Dean, to be Honorary Canon of Lichfield Cathedral. The Rev. J. Bell, Rector of Bulwell, Notts; Hon. and Rev. C. Finnon, Rector of Hunstall Kilware, Staffordshire, to be Honorary Canons of Ely. The Rev. W. J. Allen, Curate to Rotchelsop, London; Rev. W. H. Trevelyan to Mongeon and Martin, Cornwall; Rev. J. Bell, Curate to Bulwell, Notts; Rev. J. Bell, Curate to Bulwell, Notts; Rev. Wm. Tingle, Curate of Ely; Rev. Thomas Bell, Curate to Bulwell, Notts; Rev. E. Seymour, late Vicar of Wanstrow, Cornwall, to Bratton-Clovelly; Rev. J. W. Awdry to Irthlingborough; Rev. F. Courtenay to Clovelly; Rev. Charles Chapel, Plymouth; Rev. L. Taylor to St. Matthias, Bethnal-green. Perpetual Curates—Rev. C. Bell to Bulwell, Notts; Rev. Nathan Hellaby to Bulwell; Rev. J. Hoss to Wentworth, Rotherham. Curacies: Rev. T. Batchelor to Button-on-Trent; Rev. Collins to Bulwell, Notts; Rev. C. P. Grandpre to Rotchelsop; Rev. J. L. Gurney to Rotchelsop and South Carlton; Rev. H. T. Hore to Bulwell, Notts; Rev. Wm. Tingle to Bulwell, Notts; Rev. Thomas Bell to St. George's, Birmingham; Rev. G. Todd to Holy Trinity, Wicker.

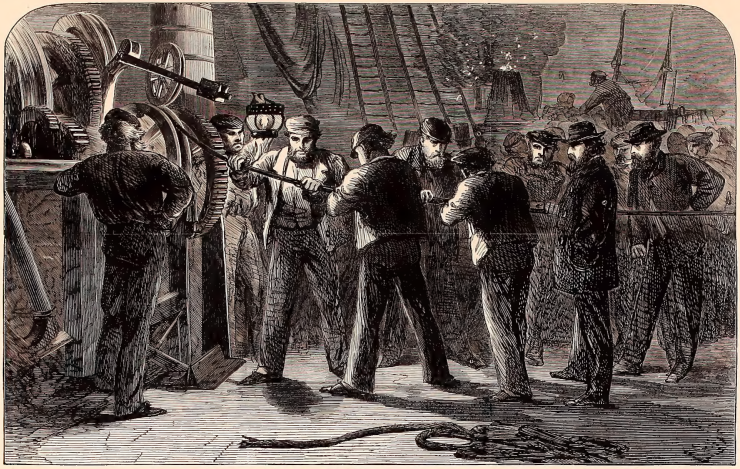
A telegram from the Danish Government that the floodgates of the Suez Canal have been thrown open, and a vessel, (it is not stated of what size) has passed through the canal from the Mediterranean Sea into the Red Sea, on the 18th inst. Intelligence of this event was telegraphed, on the same day, to the Emperor Napoleon, at Vichy, and to Europe. The vessel has anchored a passage is reply congratulating the company on their success.

The Japanese Embassy left Paris on the 19th of July for Marseilles. The Portuguese were in possession of South Ezzo. A column of 10,000 men was sent to Hakodadi, and the Russians had erected fortifications at Nabyl, in front of which a force is already posted. A partial engagement between the vanguard of these forces had ended in the defeat and rout of the Portuguese with loss, especially in horses. Ometsu had apparently declined to take any part in the hostilities with Russia.

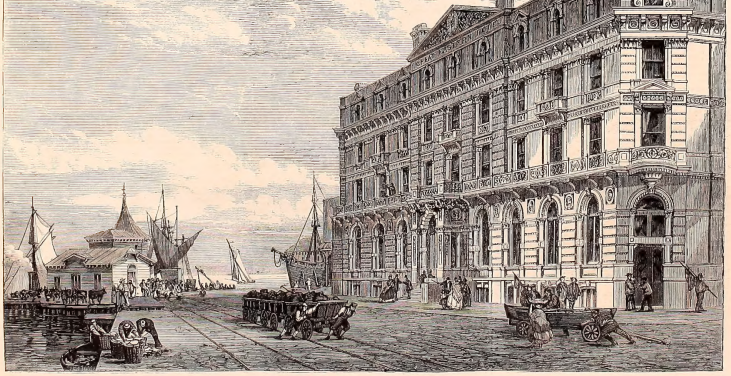


The annual fair of Nijni Novgorod began on the 27th ult., as was going on the usual activity and business. The Russian Government Calico is said to be twenty per cent below the rates of last year. Sugar is dearer, on account of the duty having been raised. The first vessel that has been so prevalent of late have necessitated stringent measures of precaution for the protection of the public. No vessel from infected ports whatever is allowed to keep their lighting, but at night. The order is extended to vessels from Constantinople, Odessa, Taganrog, and Kertch, and also to the ports of the Sea of Azoff, in consequence of a case of plague having occurred.

The two ships of the Russian ironclad squadron which were wrecked on their way to Sweden are the Smertch, a monitor with two turrets built on the Galernoi Island, and the Grigori Bogatyr, which left the Neva ran aground in Baer Sound, and sprung a leak. Endeavours were made to get her off, but she was found to be so much injured that it was thought best to run her on shore. Every necessary apparatus was accordingly brought to the spot from Helsingfors for raising the vessel out of the water. The Schooner-yacht Standart, in which the Czar and Czarina left Peterhof for Abo, took, but it now appears the only result of the accident has been a slight delay, which it is hoped will be remedied before any grounds.

The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, while on a tour in Switzerland, visited the battle-field of Morgarten, on the shores of Egeri to inspect the remains of the intrenchments and fortified stocks, and the graves of those who fell in the memorable occupation. A letter from Sonderburg gives the subjoined further particulars of the Royal visit:—"At the suggestion of the Archduke Charles Ferdinand, the Crown Prince Royal Highness the Crown Princess formed a large garland of some field flowers which they had gathered, and which they placed on the bridge on which the monuments are situated, and bound the flowers together with a blue sash which the Princess wore. Their Royal Highnesses then proceeded to the church of the Abbey, where the graves of the soldiers were also visited; and then the Prince and Princess returned to Lucerne, where they arrived in the evening. On Tuesday last they left Lucerne, their Royal Highnesses returned to Sonderburg to the castle of Vienna."

THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY HOTEL AND TERMINUS AT HARWICH.



THE town and port of Harwich, seventy miles from London, is now undergoing the most important alterations and improvements with Holland, Germany, and other countries of Northern Europe. The passenger traffic, also, by the line of Harwich and Rotterdam steamers, having to deal with a large increase, the accommodation has now considerable. We give an illustration of the noble pile of buildings which the Great Eastern Railway Company have erected close to the harbour and steam-boat pier, for a grand hotel in connection with the railway station. The style of the architecture is Italian. It has a frontage of about 120 ft., is 67 ft. high, and covers an area of something like 24,000 square feet. The façade is very handsome. It is built of white brick, relieved by stone and Portland cement dressings. The elevation to the first floor is of stone, handsomely carved, and in the panels below the windows of this floor are likewise heads of the various Kings and Queens of England who have either visited the town or granted it some especial favour. The front is broken in the centre with an elaborate portico, with open doorway and glass door-lights on each side. The cornice of this portion is very rich in carved stonework in the shape of ram' heads and bosses of fruit, surmounted with a balcony and balustrade. At each end of angle of the building are two other breaks, which form, at an angle of forty-five from the main front, two distinct features, with windows on each floor looking up and down the river in different directions to the main front. Fixed to the first-floor windows of these parts of the building, in the same line as the portico, are two very handsome circular balconies, with stone balustrades. The centre compartment of the building is crowned by a pediment, in which is an illuminated clock supported by stone dolphins. The hotel is entered by a flight of stone steps, ornamented on each side with globular lamps on massive bronze standards. The interior is most conveniently and handsomely arranged. On the ground floor is a large and elegant dining-room, with a coffee-room separated from it only by an ornamental screen, a smoking-room and public billiard-room; all spacious, commodious, and tastefully decorated. The tavern department, with a separate entrance, is at the other end of the building; and the kitchens, with other domestic offices, are behind. On the first floor which contains also seven large private sitting-rooms and four best bed-rooms, are a large occasional dining-room, a private billiard-room, and two other rooms, which can be used as one when required, for the use of the Harwich Yacht Club; besides which there are six bed-rooms, baths, and linen-closets, at the back of the building, on the same floor. The second floor is very pleasantly situated, the rooms commanding extensive views of the harbour, the River Orwell and the Stour, with pleasant and varied scenery. At the north-west end of the corridor are two cheerful sitting-rooms; and on the second floor, fourteen bed-rooms, all fitted with stoves, marble mantelpieces, and other requisites, the same as on the first floor. On the third floor are fifteen bed-rooms, bath-room, and closets, neatly furnished. The three corridors are all of stone; the stairs ascending to each floor maintain the same width throughout. The roof of the hotel is covered with lead, giving a promenade about 70 ft. long by 10 ft. wide. This will be protected by neat iron railings, and seats will be provided for the accommodation of hotel visitors. From this point an extensive view is obtained. On the one side is the German Ocean, with Dovercourt in the distance; and on the other the River Orwell, the harbour and piers of Harwich, the Stour, Shotley, and Landguard Fort. At the back of the hotel lies the town of Harwich. The cellars, which are provided with a lift or hoist for raising heavy stores to the upper floors of the hotel, are very extensive, and include bonding warehouses for the storage of wine, spirits, or tobacco. An engine has been provided to pump salt water up to bath and washing rooms, from a well sunk by the company. This water runs through a bed of sand, and will always be found clean and cool. A courtyard surrounds the entire building.

The architect of the Great Eastern Hotel is Mr. T. Allom, of London; the builders are Messrs. Lucas Brothers, of London and Lowestoft; and the work appears to have been most substantially carried out, under the direction of their manager, Mr. W. R. Lacey.

FOREIGN CATTLE ON BOARD THE BATAVIER, LONDON AND ROTTERDAM STEAMER.

LANDING FOREIGN CATTLE AT THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN WHARF, NEAR THE LONDON DOCKS.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE FOREIGN CATTLE TRADE IN THE PORT OF LONDON.

THE importation of foreign beef and sheep for the immense consumption of London has lately been a subject of no small discussion, and the spread of the cattle disease has occasioned no much anxiety as to the condition in which they are brought to our market, that we have thought it opportune to give one or two illustrations of the manner in which this trade is carried on in the Thames. A considerable share of the foreign cattle trade—especially from Holland, the Elbe, and Schleswig-Holstein—comes by way of Harwich and the Great Eastern Railway, and some of it by way of Hull; but the greater portion of the cattle imported for the London market are disembarked at three London wharves. One of these, the British and Foreign Wharf, is near the London Docks; the other two are lower down, at Blackwall—Brown's Wharf, which belongs to the General Steam Navigation Company; and the Brunswick Cattle Wharf, which belongs to the Blackwall Railway. During the summer months nearly the whole of cattle are disembarked at the two latter of these landing-places, where we also receive, per week, peril, veal, and mutton to the extent of 1800 pigs, 750 calves, and 10,000 sheep. These London docks are brought over by three thirty-knot steamers chiefly from Rotterdam, Rennon, Tonning, Antwerp, Harlingen, Middelsbaak, Helvoet, Hamburg, and Ostend. Only a few years ago we fitted up exclusively for the transport of cattle. Of the thirty London ships in the trade, many are passenger steamers, which bring over a few beasts on their decks besides the general cargo. Of this class is the Batavier, belonging to the Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, and plying between Rotterdam and Blackwall. Four or five ships, belonging to the General Steam Navigation, belong to the same trade, according to a private shipowner, whose vessels come to the British and Foreign Wharf, are cattle-ships and nothing else. The Hull and Hamburg trading between Rotterdam and Brown's Wharf at Blackwall, was built a year or two ago for the single purpose of carrying cattle and sheep. She can accommodate 300 beasts and 1200 sheep, and even then find room for a good many calves and pigs. When the vessel is full the animals cover the upper deck completely on the intermediate deck, and fill the lower hold, so that they are to three tiers, without counting an extra tier of sheep constantly on deck. Each beast, however, has standing room, and the cattle are all tied athwartships, some being left between each pair of the stanchions to pass along with water. Each deck is connected with that above and below by sets of perforated planes called "shoots," through which the sloping platforms, with battens nailed across them to afford footbold, and stout wooden balustrades to prevent the beasts from falling as they go up or down; for no slings are used, even in the act of export or during the disembarkation. The animals are driven up or down the planes in an orderly manner, and with no difficulty that could be supposed. From the upper deck they pass on shore along a gangway, and are at once hauled at any time at the dock. This operation is performed in two or three hours; and on Saturday or Sunday's, when large cargoes of live meat arrive, the whole consignment is ready for the Monday's market, there is need of the utmost dispatch. One of our Illustrations shows the process of unloading a whole cargo of sheep and cattle from the Magnet, a regular cattle-ship, at the British and Foreign Wharf. There were 1600 sheep on the upper deck, crowded into several pens; in the lower hold were a number of cattle standing on the ship's ballast. These poor beasts, which were sadly dirty from their stalls, show any signs of suffering from sea-sickness, or some, to scramble up the steeps connecting the upper with the lower decks of the vessel, as each was led by a rope from the latter. Not only in one case, when an ox slipped down on the short landing-up from the lower hold, was there any difficulty in getting the animal up. Even in this instance, though the drovers had some trouble, the ox was not twisted with any great roughness. On all these wharves they are kept well in order, so far as it is possible to do so. If they come ashore in the middle of the night, or between the hours of five and ten on Sunday they are kept at the wharves, which are sufficiently capacious. The Brunswick will accommodate 300 beasts, the British and Foreign 1200, and Brown's about 600 more. Here a large piece of open ground is attached to the wharf where thousands of animals might stand. Every beast is examined on its arrival on shore by veterinary surgeons appointed by the Board of Trade, who wield a despatch power of life and death over the cattle, and have always to spare a bullock who is any way diseased. A slaughter-house is attached to each wharf, and the condemned animal is killed there before leaving the premises. The foreign cattle are again inspected as they enter the Metropolitan Market, in the Caledonian-road, Islington, where they pass into the hands of the butchers.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1864.

"WE don't expect no good grammar here, but you might shut the door to." Such was stated by the late Mr. G. A. a Beckett to have been a criticism which he heard publicly addressed by a gentleman of the chimney-sweeping persuasion to the manager of one of the infernal theatres. One feels singularly inclined to adopt the remonstrance to present circumstances, and address it to such of our American friends as are grumbling and murmuring against England, and looking jealously because we are exchanging courtesies with France. With such a press as that of the States, and with universal suffrage in the hands of persons who are led by such a press, it would be unreasonable to expect argument, or even patient attention to the arguments of others. But considering that five years ago all the inhabitants of the States were "Americans," and that to censure one of them, North or South, was to offend all; and considering that since that time a very large portion of these Americans declared their belief that it would be a good thing to divide the country into two parts, we may almost be allowed to suggest that American gentlemen should settle matters among themselves, and somehow induce the minority to assent to the views of the majority before flying at strangers and threatening to fight them because a few thousands here thought that seven millions there had something to say for themselves. The American manager should "shut the scenes to."

Will our friends over the water forget the war and all its glories and miseries, for a few minutes, and just reconstruct American society and reproduce American feeling as they existed a year before the Southern row was fired. May we ask them, in all good nature, whether at that time an English writer who should have said of the smallest Southern State what all the Northern organs are now saying of the whole Confederacy would have been received with all the force of the press and of public oratory in all parts of the Union? Is it not notorious that no American ever could bear to hear a single syllable against any other American? There was never a community like it, except, perhaps, Scotland; but there are but three millions of Scottish people, and they are supposed to be all more or less related, so that to insult a Scot is to abuse a family. In America there were thirty millions all bound to "treat one another well," and they did it. In travelling, could anything be more unlike than the mode in which an Englishman and a Yankee spoke when a country man of either had disgraced himself. "A smoothfaced rascal, Sir, John Bull would say, and enough to have heard three quarters up the table-d'hôte, "and I'm glad he's come to grief. His father got his peerage by jobbery, and the whole family is no better than it ought to be. It is a good thing that a man should be cleared out of the public service." And he gave a kind of Rhadamanthine nod of approval of his own stern justice. Not so the American in similar circumstances—"The kind of treatment necessary in such cases. Such is not right by apprehended law, and those who live in the localities, and the gentleman you name has made his way to affluence from very humble beginnings, and we do not judge such a man harshly, and he has much influence with the people." Such were the different ways in which Englishmen and Americans were accustomed to deal with their fellow-citizens. We do not offer an opinion as to which was the wiser course, or whether it is better to be perfectly frank and honest and ignore all accidental ties, or whether we should wash all our dirty linen at home: we only wish to remind the Americans that it was only the other day that we were all united, and could speak, not to one of them that another was in the wrong. And now they talk of quarrelling with us because, at a couple of thousand miles distance, and with no information on which we could absolutely rely, we have not run and ready at the slightest notice to call six or seven millions of Americans thieves, rebels, traitors, murderers, and miscreants. We simply put the matter on the ground of fair play.

Then, again, let those charge us with cowardice if they will; but we perceive another awful peril from which we have escaped. Only suppose that things had taken a different turn, and matters had been arranged without an appeal to the sword. Suppose that the people from Sumter had awakened not rage, but common-sense; and that men who spoke the English language had unanimously exclaimed that they were not going to kill one another for tariffs or niggers, and that a convention should settle all disputes. We heartily wish that such a solution had been tried. But suppose, also, that John Bull had at once given way to all those feelings which he is now abused for lacking; and while things looked like war, had opened his mouth in denunciation of the wicked slaveowners and traitors;—why, as soon as peace had been made, both sides would have turned upon the insolent Bull, and demanded how he dared to expect anything but a calm and rational line of conduct from American citizens. Nations ruled and schooled by a savage aristocracy might go to war for red and white roses, for lovelocks and roundheads, for states of sovereignty and Popish warming-pans; but enlightened citizens were not so to be dragged into bloodshed. And it would have required all the civility possessed by Earl Russell to frame despatches to avoid a castigatory war. Such is the state in which we are now amused because a section of our upper ten thousand believed what the American press had been so long saying about the aristocratic character of the slaveowner.

We certainly should be exceedingly sorry if the hatred which is stated to be prevalent against us in the States should take the form of actual hostility. Should it do so, we believe that it will be in opposition to the wishes and feelings of the Government of the States and of educated citizens. But if a nation will give universal suffrage to the scum of all lands, that nation must be prepared to find the intruders troublesome, and moreover, disposed to fraternise with the lowest and most ignorant part of the home population. It is chiefly among politicians from these classes that the anti-English feeling is kept up, and we could hardly wish that such a population did not hate English institutions. We are content, for the present, to believe that the hostile sentiments, of which we hear so much, are mainly those of the classes whom all cultivated persons hold in contempt, and whom statesmen endeavour also to hold in subjection. And, believing this, we have, in all good-humour, appealed to the real American citizen to look back to what he now calls "old times," but which are not so very old, and to remember our relations as they then were. He was so astute in teaching us that we were not to suppose any American ever in the wrong that he ought not to be angry with us for being slow to believe that seven millions of Americans are such atrocious monsters that they ought to be exterminated, and their property (over £4000) given to other American gentlemen of more correct views. But if menace and accession go on, we may be sure pipeclay will have an importance in learning to express counter-sympathy.

THE COURT.

THE Queen, with the members of the Royal family, continues at the Riversion, Cobourg.

On Tuesday her Majesty received a deputation, consisting of the Ober Bürgermeister Medor and three magistrates of the town of Coburg. The deputation expressed to the Queen the satisfaction of the citizens at her Majesty's arrival at the Rosenau, and also received the Queen's commands respecting the inauguration of the Prince Consort's statue.

On Wednesday week the Queen visited the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg at the Kallenberg. In the evening her Majesty received the Duchess of Coburg at dinner.

On Saturday last Duke Ernest of Saxe-Coburg (her Majesty's cousin) visited the Queen. The Duchess of Saxe-Coburg dined with her Majesty in the evening.

On Sunday Princess Helena and Louise attended Divine service. The General Superintendent Meyer officiated. Prince Alexander had gone to Reinhardsbrunn for a few days with the Duke of Coburg, returned to Coburg, and visited the Queen at the Rosenau.

The Queen, with the members of the Royal family, rides daily, walking and driving exercise in the vicinity of the Rosenau.

The Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, General Baron von Alvensleben (Master of the Horse), Baron von Wangenheim (Chief Secretary to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg), Baron Löwenfels, and Earl Kinnoull have dined with the Queen.

The Coburg Choral Society had the honour of singing before the Queen, on Thursday week, at the Rosenau.

Prince Alfred is visiting the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg at the Kallenberg. The Prince pays daily visits to the Queen.

The statue of the late Prince Consort, which the Prince Consort will take place to-day (Saturday). The programme of the ceremonies is as follows: The Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg will receive Queen Victoria, before the commencement of the ceremony, upon a platform erected close to the monument. Immediately upon her Majesty's arrival the English National Anthem will be played, and the Burgomeister of Coburg will address the Queen. The monument will then be unveiled, an anthem will be sung, and the ceremony will terminate with the playing of bells and the discharge of cannon from the fortress of Coburg, while young girls will deposit garlands at the foot of the monument. In addition to the guests at the ducal court, with their suites, the participators in the ceremony will be the local authorities, officials both in active service and retired, the clergy and members of the schools; the town is decorated throughout the streets through which the ceremony will take place. Cards of admission will also be distributed by the Court Marshal to the inhabitants of houses who may apply, so far as the seats will admit. Places will be reserved beside and behind the monument for the Royal Princes, in accordance with the executive, artists, and mechanics and the members of the respective guilds. The ground will be kept by the Coburg soldiers. The statue differs only in a few details from that of the Prince Consort which is to be erected in front of the Albert Hall. The Engraving of which was given in this Journal for the 17th of June last.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Cambridge have been enjoying during the past week with the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary at the Grand Hotel, Scarborough, near Frankfort. The Royal party and suite attended Divine service last Sunday at the English church in Frankfort. Mr. Stanley Leighton, the Chaplain, officiated and preached. Sir A. Mallet, Bart., his Majesty's Minister at Frankfort, was in attendance on their Royal Highnesses. A crowded congregation assembled to hear the sermon.

The Prince and Princess, accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge, were to-day to arrive at Kronberg, a country residence, in order to be present at the inauguration of the Prince Consort's memorial.

The Prince and Princess, according to present arrangements, will leave Cronberg to-morrow, en route for Homburg.

It is stated that the Prince and Princess will visit the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, at Dunrobin Castle, before returning south at the close of the season.

PRINCE ARTHUR.

His Royal Highness Prince Arthur attended by Major Elphinstone, left Blackheath, on Monday, en route for Coburg, to join the Queen. The Prince travelled via Westbeck Dock to Harwich, where a twelve o'clock, on board the Admiralty steam-vessel Vivid, for Antwerp. Colonel Ley held.

His Excellency the Prussian Ambassador and Countess Bernstorff have arrived at Kissengen.

His Excellency the Austrian Ambassador has left Clandon House on leave of absence, and is gone to join Countess Appony at Ischl.

The Duke and Duchess of Beaufort and the Ladies Scott have gone to Badminton, Northamptonshire.

The Duchess (Emily) of Beaufort has left town on a visit to Lord and Lady Ashburton, at their residence, the Grange, Hants.

The Earl and Countess of Shaftesbury have gone to Air-la-Chapelle.

The Countess of Clonmel and the Ladies Scott have arrived at Sir Harmore's Hotel from Llandudno, North Wales.

The Earl of Dunmore has left Dunmore Park for his seat in the Isle of Harris.

The Earl of Pectlow, M.P., has left Grafton-street for the Lodge, Yarpole, Leominster.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston have arrived at Brocket Hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Arabella Stewart have arrived at Surrenden-Dering, Ashford, Kent, from Belgrave-square. Mr. Stewart has taken Surrenden-Dering for August.

The Right Hon. Sir George Grey, Bart., has left his seat, Falloden, Northumberland, on a tour of visits in Scotland.

The Right Hon. Edward Cardwell, M.P., has arrived at his seat in Lincolnshire.

The opening of the Croatian and Sclavonic Diet has been adjourned to Oct. 5.

The Wittemberg Chambers, which have been in Session since the 19th of December last year, were closed yesterday week, by the Minister of the Interior, Herr Boettcher, in the name of the King.

The late Earl of Charlemont's curious library of books and manuscripts has dispersed by auction. Amongst the lots was a curious old edition of Shakspeare, which fetched £465. The entire proceeds of the sale were £2,000.

The London and South-Western Railway Company has adopted the plan of electric communication between passengers and guard which was brought lately under the notice of the public by Mr. Preece. The carriages of the Exeter express are now fitted with the apparatus.

We are requested to mention, with respect to Mr. James Parker's discovery of the remains of the ancient Church of St. Pancratius at Rome, of which we gave two illustrations a fortnight ago, that Mr. S. W. Tracy, of Bedford Chambers, made the drawings which we engraved, to show no a ground plan of the church, having surveyed all the accessible portion of the underground structure.

We have to thank the Lords of the Admiralty for granting our Special Artist a passage from Portsmouth to Chichester and back in the Inland R.M.S. Urgent, which conveyed a large party of naval and military officers to the International Football match played there. Through the kind attention of the commanding officer of that vessel, Captain Hen ry Bedford, we are particularly acknowledgi.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

A DREADFUL thing, a melancholy thing, that military murder at Chatham! The almost preternatural atrocity of Scotland's crime may throw the Brompton-Harrods tragedy into the shade; but it is not the less an event which, for a length of time, will be remembered with softness and pity by all military men. Major De Vere is dead, although for a few hours hopes were entertained of his recovery. He was shot through the lungs. Well, men with knots as dire have been ere now made whole by the leech. In Monsieur Henri de Pene, editor of La Gazette des Etrangers, walking the Boulevard des Italiens, a prosperous gentleman: and did he not, in the Bois, receive shots at the extreme point of death, with two sword-thrusts right through his liver? But the Major has succumbed. To the distinguished corps of Royal Engineers—an arm of the service whose officers are not more remarkable for their practical scientific knowledge, than, as a rule, their men for intelligence, sobriety, and probity—it may be a kind of consolation to know that the Major's murderer, Private Flynn, was not a plot on the whole body of soldier-artizans was not bred a Sapper. He came originally, I believe, from a marching regiment. He may mean a small matter; but the Sappers and Miners have always borne proudly of the good name of their non-commissioned officers and men. Noblesse oblige: and there is that saying that an honest as a Sapper" a proverb. The noblest form of esprit de corps that I know of. Better even than with the French Service Sapeurs-Pompiers. They are the best vain, but the proudest, men in the French army, simply because they are the bravest. Brave, indeed, I never saw anywhere." I remember once in Paris reading a curious instance of their sensitiveness. It was at the opening of the Grand Opera House, the largest theatre in France—be they balls, theatrical performances, or concerts, public or private entertainments, the Opera House is the largest theatre-room in case of accidents. At a certain ball in the Faubourg St. Germain there chanced to be several officers from the Sapper-table, and, in spite of the unsuitest ranch, could not be found. Pompiers who had attended the fête were returning at break of day to their barracks, when a sergeant of the corps, Pierre Thibaut, the Corporal, who had reason to suspect one of his men of the theft, taxed him with it. He denied it. Then the Corporal ordered his head to be searched, and the missing spoons were found upon him. "Now, you rascal," said the Corporal, "I'll report you to the guilty Pompiers to the guardhouse? Not at all. He held a council of officers upon the circumstance, and gave the culprit the choice of either jumping off the parapet of the Pont Royal into the Seine, or of being reported to the Minister of the Interior. The most curious part of the story is that the thief saw the force of the very choice that was given him, and preferred the water to the land. When a sergeant de ville, who had watched the group unperceived, came up and arrested him.

The "enormous gooseberry" season has set in, but it is of course not to be compared with the "enormous gooseberry" of the celebrated fruit. Possibly the imminence of real and momentous things leaves little for the mind to dwell upon in the matter of fruit. Who's the "Hinderpet"—which in old-fashioned English used to be called a nonnuine—the clothes, the Atlantic telegraph cable, the reconstruction of the Government, the state of Ireland, the Egyptian loan, the news papers have enjoyed infinite a tolerably sufficient pabulum, and the ordinary subjects of conversation, without bothering about the fruit. When a sergeant de ville, who had watched the group unperceived, came up and arrested him.

THE MATTERHORN, FROM A SKETCH BY MR. EDWARD WHYMPER.

We are indebted to Mr. Edward Whymper, one of the survivors of the late disaster, for a Sketch of the mountain which has acquired such a sad notoriety during the past month. The Matterhorn forms part of the main ridge or backbone of the Pennine Alps, and stands at the head of the valley of Zermatt on one side and of the valley of Val Tournanche on the other. It is in height inferior only to five other peaks—viz., Mont Blanc, Monte Rosa, the Mischabel, Lyskamm, and the Weisshorn, and is itself no less than 14,705 ft. high. In apparent height it is greater than any; and when viewed from the direction of Zermatt, from which the sketch we have engraved is taken, it is difficult to believe that it stands only sixth on the list of the peaks of the Alps. Zermatt itself is 5500 ft. above the level of the sea, and therefore more than one-third of the height is lost; but the remaining 9469 ft. rise in slopes so rapid, and in precipices so steep, that the impression produced, on the minds even of the most careful observers, is that of perpendicularity.

It is impossible to look on the Matterhorn without being impressed by its majesty and apparent inaccessibility: the boldest climbers have looked and longed, but have not dared to try to reach its summit. So entirely and hopelessly impregnable does it appear from a distance that scarcely anyone has approached to make a nearer survey, and it is, doubtless, on this account that it has hitherto remained unscaled. Professor Forbes, who, in years gone by, accomplished much difficult work in the Alps, speaks in his writings of "its unapproachable precipices, which will for ever prevent the geologist from a nearer survey." De Saussure, a pellast although not a great mountaineer, stood at its base, and exclaimed in wonder, "What power must have been required to break and to sweep away the fragments from this pyramid!" and all who have viewed it employ the same language, "overhanging, smooth, flawless, unconquerable!"

Thus years went by, and the Matterhorn remained unscaled; but no mountaineers grew more bold and virgin peaks less numerous, the wistful eyes of many were directed towards its summit, and some even wandered to its base. First, some guides of Val Tournanche tried on their own side, but they stopped when yet a long way from the summit. Then, in 1860, Professor Tyndall and Mr. Hawkins made an attempt, but were beaten in like manner. In 1861 Mr. Whymper tried, but scarcely got as high as the last-named party. Returning again in 1862, he made five different attempts, getting on one occasion to a greater height by himself than had ever been attained before; but all his expeditions were defeated, without exception, by bad weather. In 1862 Professor Tyndall again attacked the mountain, with an extraordinarily strong body of guides, and got higher than Mr. Whymper; but he, too, was forced to return when within a thousand feet of the summit. Again, in 1863, Mr. Whymper tried, and was defeated by weather. The mountain was then left alone until the present year, and on the 13th (all the previous attempts having been made from Val Tournanche), and 14th of July it was attacked for the first time on its northern side with the result which is too well known. Mr. Whymper's narrative of that fatal expedition has been given to the public. We desire now to recommend to our readers the subscription which has been set on foot by Mr. Wyngate and Mr. W. Maclure for the benefit of the mother and sister of Michel Cruz, of Chamouni, the brave and faithful guide, who perished on that sad occasion.

The manner in which this wonderful obelisk has been produced has been the subject of inquiry and of astonishment to all observers. It is almost impossible to believe that it retains its original form: and the Saracens seemed to feel this in the language we have already quoted. But what, then, has become of the fragments? Are they to be found? Are no great heaps of ruins around its base? Not here curious is the material of which it is composed! Sandstone, mica slate and chloride slate. Smooth and flawless as its cliffs certainly appear at a distance, when approached closely the mountain on one side appears covered with a heap of ruins; for, under the combined action of sun and frost, disintegration is rapidly proceeding, and huge masses are probably thousands of tons fall from its sides on every day; but so enormous is the mass that the accumulation at its base are but as mole-hills compared with the whole.

We conclude this brief notice of the celebrated mountain with one of the finest passages in the works of a great English writer:—"It is not this a strong type," says he, "in the very heart and height of these mysterious Alps—these upheaved hills which, in the midst of their baired old age, at first so silent, then, as we keep quiet at their feet, muttering and growling to us querulously in their deep voices, and then, as it were, about their childhood—is it not a strange type of the things which—not of weakness nor age—but of power, are of a race whose little flakes of mica-sand, hurried in tremulous spangles along the bottom of the meanest river—too light to sink, too feeble to float, almost too small for sight—could have had a mind given to it as it was at last borne down with its kindred dust into the abysses of the seas, and laid (would it not have thought?) for a hopeless eternity in the dark ooze, the most despised, forgotten, and feeble of all earth's atoms, what would it have thought had it been told that one day, knitted into a strength as of imperishable iron, rooted deep by the sea, unfeasible by the flame, cast of the substance of it, with its fellows, the eye of God should bow that Alpine tower that opposed—power, helpless and blind, to the wild north winds; should rage in vain; beneath it—low-fallen mica flake!—the emery hills should lie heaped like flocks of sheep, and the white walls of earth fade away in rampaded blue; and around it—weak, wave-drifted mica flake!—the great war of the winter clouds should rage in thunder, and yet stir it not; and the fiery arrows and aggry meteors of the night fall blunted back from it into the air; and all the stars in the clear heaven should light, one by one as for a new constellation, upon the points of snow that fringed its shaking place on the impenetrable pure?"

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The West London Exhibition, which was opened about three months ago in the Kensington Hall, Commercial-road, was closed on Saturday night, with a monster concert. The total number of persons who visited the exhibition was 26,753, and the amounts received from the sale of tickets was £1407. The receipts from all sources were about £1800, whilst the expenditure amounted to nearly £2000. Although the exhibition was not, ever, the committee expected to realise £200 from the sale of stalls, and the remainder would have to be met by the guarantors.

The several boards of the companies interested in the Atlantic telegraph have held meetings during the past week, principally under the temporary dispositment which has occurred. No specific result was settled, except that the utmost confidence is expressed as to the success during the spring of next year prevailed. The necessary overhauling of the great line of cables, the examination of the core, and the entire re-manufacture of new rope, and other work would. It is found, occupy too much time for the present autumn expedition being sent to sea with any certainty of success; but not the slightest doubt exists as to finding the cable perfect next year, or of reaching the shores of the United States early in May of that year. Immediate and complete action will be taken to complete during the present year the laying of the proposed line from one shore to another by the Agamemnon, the unanimous opinion of the directors of the Construction Company, and of those who have had the management of the affair entertained.

The annual meeting of the governors of the Royal Dispensary for Diseases of the Throat, &c., was held, on Monday, at the residence of Mr. Babo. The report stated that the dispensary was instituted in 1816, and has received the patronage of the late King of the Netherlands, the late Duke of York, the Duke of York and Kent, and also of the Prince Consort. It now enjoys the patronage of the King of the Belgians, the Duke of Cambridge, and many illustrious others. During the past year 3120 patients had been entered on the books, of whom 1764 only were again relieved, and 1356 discharged cured; the corresponding weeks of ten years—1852-61—the average number, corrected for increase of population, was 1891. The deaths registered in London last week were 1192. It was the thirty-third week of the year, and the average number of deaths during that week in the previous ten years was 1000. Deducting 10 per cent for increase of population, 900 is the number that ought to be the average; hence the mortality from diarrhœa in London exhibits a great decrease. During the past two years of pestilence, the average number from this disease was above 300; in the last week they declined to 116. The average number for the corresponding week of the ten years was 100. The person last reported dead in London, 29th, is the woman that died, Aug. 29, in 1859, the deaths from diarrhœa were 240; in the same week of 1854 were 242. Besides the deaths recorded as caused by diarrhœa, there were others which fear occurred to adults, were referred to cholera or cholera diarrhœa. Four deaths by heroes and intemperance were registered in London during the week.—In the week that ended last Saturday the births registered in London and the other towns of the United Kingdom were 1192. In the deaths registered 1026. The annual rate of mortality was 24 per 1000 persons living in London; in Edinburgh, 20; in Glasgow, 22; in Manchester and Salford, 26; in Liverpool, 29; in Birmingham—births 259, deaths 209; in Salford—births 82, deaths 72; in Bristol—births 101, deaths 69; in Hull—births 70, deaths 52; in Leeds—births 178, deaths 89; in Glasgow—births 313, deaths 251; in Edinburgh—births 176, deaths 116. LAW AND POLICE.—A jury has taken a merciful view of the case of one John Howard, who is described as an oft-convicted thief, on a charge against his employer was one of pocket-picking, and when before the police magistrate Howard pleaded guilty. The magistrate, however, considered that there was a case for a jury, and committed the prisoner for trial. Howard was tried the case to trial, and to trial it ensued the Middlesex Sessions on Monday. Howard now pleaded not guilty to the charge, and said "It was my employer's fault, being warned that it would meet with an impartial consideration at the hands of so distinguished and enlightened a jury as he was then addressing. The "enlightened jury" acquitted him; and he left the court, saying that he had expected as much.

We have to record another appalling crime. A married woman, in a miserable hovel in Kentish-town, on Wednesday morning, was found with her throat cut, and her children with their throats nearly cut. The woman was alive, but the neighbours had not the courage to enter the house early enough to save her life. She was conveyed to the workhouse infirmary, and died there on Thursday morning. The husband, a labourer, was arrested on the charge of murder. He is a man of very violent temper, and has been frequently in custody for assaults upon his wife. The children are recovering.

Some of the inhabitants of the Eastern Pyrenees, intending to erect a statue to Arago, invited his son, M. Emmanuel Arago, to assist at its inauguration. The latter refused the invitation, on the ground that the statue committee has not taken cognisance of the services of his father as a deputy, as Minister of War, as Minister of Marine in 1848, and as President of the Executive Commission; but intends only to honour him as a savant.

The arrangements in connection with the Wakefield Industrial and Fine-Art Exhibition, which is to be opened on the 30th inst., are rapidly approaching completion. More than a thousand persons have intimated their intention to exhibit articles, and the space committee have begun their duties. Lord Houghton, the president, will deliver an address at the inauguration of the exhibition, and the Archbishop of York will take part in the opening proceedings.

COUNTRY NEWS.

A new iron screw-steamer, called the Natal, belonging to the Cape of Good Hope Mail Packet Company, was launched, on Tuesday, from the shipyard of Messrs. Day and Co., at Northam, in Hants.

Mr. Adam Gifford, advocate, has been appointed Sheriff and Steward of the Sheriffdoms or stewartries of Orkney and Zetland, in the room of Professor Balfour, deceased.

The local papers state that Lord Dacre has been appointed to the hall Hereditary of Rose, rendered vacant by the death of Viscount Maynard; and that the vice-lieutenancy has been conferred on Sir Thomas Webster Rose Webster, Bart., of Battle Abbey.

A meeting of the committee for the erection of the Manchester Cotton Memorial was held on Monday, at the Townhall—Mr. W. Fairbairn in the chair. After some conversation it was resolved that the time be limited to the end of the year for the receipt of designs to complete the memorial satisfactorily.

A town meeting of colliers was held, on Monday, in a field near the banks of the Hollingworth Lake, to consider the question of ascertaining the amount in wages and the hours of labour. There were about 4000 persons present. It was resolved that a Miners' Association be formed for the purpose of obtaining 7s per day as the minimum, and that the Association should be dissolved. It was also resolved that "We, the colliers of Hollingworth, do not belong to that association, and will not join it by any means to ensure the advance of wages and lessen the hours of miners to eight per day, or forty-eight per week."

The Devon and Cornwall life-boat harvest was held, a few days ago, at Plymouth. Lady Carew and other interested ones from the county took charge of stalls, which were well filled with needlework and the usual articles for sale on such occasions. The sum of £1000 was the day's sale yielded between £600 and £700, including subscriptions and donations. The Mayor of Plymouth presided over the life-boat, and was supported by a considerable number with which he organised this banner. The National Life-boat Institution has expended between £2000 and £3000 on its fourteen life-boat establishments on the Devon and Cornwall coasts. All the life-boats on the list belong to that institution.

On Tuesday week, while it was blowing a strong gale from S.S.W., the Lowestoft life-boat was launched to the assistance of a small steamer, bound from Hartlepool to Woolwich with a cargo of coal) was observed to be in distress, and apparently labouring in that direction. On coming up, the vessel proved to be the timer breaking over her. The Lowestoft life-boat in consequence, ran for her, and, after considerable difficulty, succeeded in getting her to the mouth of the river, and brought four men safely on shore. Two of the crew of the steamer, with the captain, left the ship's boat, and were picked up by a Yarmouth fishing-boat, and landed safe, and was safely brought into Lowestoft harbour by means of the steam-tug. The vessel was yesterday week, in Lowestoft harbour, one of the life-boat working at the pumps.

At a public dinner at Bradford, yesterday week, Mr. Jacob Behrens stated that the commerce of Bradford had been created during the last thirty years, and within a period of twenty years the population of the Bradford trade. He remembered a time when there were only two or three merchants in Bradford who were in the habit of importing foreign wools, and now there were hundreds in the aggregate, and at present he had reason to believe the yearly transactions in foreign wools amounted to between seven and eight millions sterling. Not only the dyers, but the fuller, were very much short of twenty millions sterling. The manufacturers of Bradford had also increased in a similar proportion. Not without occasional and anxious checks, but each prevent, as it were, only a stepping-stone to greater prosperity. Bradford had now a population of 150,000 souls, and was capable, for exercise, he might confidently assert that trade of Bradford had increased in a greater proportion than that of any other town in the kingdom.

The arrangements for the annual congress of the British Association for the Advancement of Science are nearly completed. The week, beginning with Monday, the 22nd inst., and ending with Saturday, the 27th inst., will be occupied by the meeting, which will be opened by the inaugural address. On Tuesday and Friday there will be sittings of the sections, excepting the latter day, and on Tuesday, the 23rd inst., the whole of there will be excursions to Worcester and Malvern, to Shrewsbury and Wenlock, to Hereford, Ross, Tintern Abbey, and the Wye, and to Cheltenham. The concluding business meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 24th inst., and the meeting will terminate with a special excursion to attractive places in the neighbourhood. Among the latter, Gloucester, Berkeley Castle, and Thornbury Castle, the seat of the Earl of Ducie, will be visited. A special provision shall be made for the visitors. The mines and large manufactories of Dowlais, Merthyr, and Cyfarthfa, in Glamorganshire, will be visited on the occasion of a scientific excursion on the 19th and 17th. A geological excursion will be made on the 18th, and the meeting in Aberdare will be held on the 19th and 20th inst. The meeting is expected to be very largely attended, in consequence of the proximity of Birmingham to the place of meeting. The local committee there is greater than that at Bath, where the meeting was held last year. The Mayor of Birmingham, Mr. Ryland, M.P., is the president of the committee. The archæological attractions of the city and county of Durham, Thanks, were visited, on Wednesday, by the Archæological Institute. Durham Castle, the seat of the Bishop, and the Chancellor, on behalf of the University, met welcomed the resolution to Durham. The Castle, which was built by William the Conqueror, and the Cathedral, the finest of which is ascribed to the reign of William the Conqueror. The whole of the Castle, with the exception of the chapel, and the grand staircase, which is the work of Bishop Cosin, was inspected

THE FARM.

A VERY interesting gathering took place in the Vale of Alford last week. After some athletic games, a dinner was given to Mr. Wm. M'Combie, the champion polled breeder, by the farm servants, tradesmen, and crofters in the Vale and the surrounding districts, as "an expression of their gratitude to him for the interest he has taken in the elevation of the working classes." With the exception of a few farmers and invited guests, the whole 450 were farm servants, from the stripling of sixteen to the lads full man of harvesters and men who had helped to hand down the tale of how "the powerful, pushing, and progressive Mr. M'Combie" contended with Lords and Dukes and Globulis; and how the "great M'Combie," at the head of the lowlands, even kept the Queen in check. Many "Auld Acquaintance" were called for, and we are now in the era of

The sacred market toon,
The out and ness of stouy,
Knows all his name by heart.

Mr. Joss, cattleman to Mr. M'Combie and secretary to the dinner, opened the after proceedings very appropriately by reading a letter of Mr. Lamond (one of Mr. M'Combie's friends), who, while he holds a high agricultural office under the Emperor of the French, during from the Tuileries, he does not forget the days of "auld lang syne" that his friends will not know, I believe, without a great pleasure that, when you sit to at dinner at Bridge of Alford, another dinner will be given on the same occasion, to the honour of Mr. M'Combie, in France, more than 800 miles from Alford. The chair of Mr. William M'Combie will be empty, but his mind shall be amongst us. I owe to his example what I have done for agriculture in France, what I have done for the improvement of the labouring population (erecting of numerous cottages given to agricultural labourers, award of agricultural gold medals of honour every year to the best agricultural servants and crofters of the Crown estates, &c. &c.)

In the course of a very excellent speech, Mr. M'Combie observed how much he would like success to the new Vale of Alford society; and then, dwelling with much feeling on the confidence he reposed in them, he added these pregnant words: "Long may peace and plenty be the lot of your native land! Long may each and all of you enjoy the blessings that their servants have feelings perhaps as sensitive as their own, and they should treat them as men like themselves. He cannot be expected that a servant will be as much interested in the prosperity of his master if he sees that he is respected by that master, and is treated as if he were an evil thing. It was with much heartache sneering, and toasts were given going. "Life is short and why should anyone be long" and "Auld Lang Syne" and a plentiful number of toasts in three hours and a half, winding up with "Farewell, and may Tyrnale Servants, Crofters, and Tenantry, "Skippers of Cattle," "Wives and Families," "Agricultural Societies," "Bridge of Alford Hotel;" and concluded a very pleasant evening for the Vale with a ball.

This has been one of Mr. M'Combie's most successful years, as he only took the stools to the Aberdeen show and was first in every class, and won two out of the three challenge cups, a feat never accomplished before. At Inverness he gained the first prize for the best fat cattle. five first prizes the was placed second as well as first in the row class), the gold medium handed to him by the Queen as breeder of the best bull.

The breeders about Aberdeen are greatly alarmed about the cattle plague, and it has been resolved to assess the county at 2d. in the pound, to be raised one half by the landlords and the other half by tenants, to reimburse the unfortunate sufferers. It has broken out in three places, at one of which sixteen out of twenty-two cattle in a byre at Cove were destroyed and buried 5 ft. deep. Professor Dick, who has now been fifty years or more in the profession, does not, evidently, incline to the belief that it was the Russian plague, but rather a bad case of a low typhoid fever. "It depends," he considers) chiefly on atmospheric causes and the diet of the cattle, which is sometimes of an irritating and occasional changes of diet." He adds—"When any case of even suspicious nature he would at once give the most powerful medicines to every beast in the herd, say of 1 lb. common salt, 1 lb. treacle, and 7 oz. of ginger, and that this dose might be repeated in 12 hours if the case manifested itself, he thinks "the best plan to adopt will be to give 1 lb. of linseed oil in the first place, and after it has operated, 1 lb. of common salt, and plenty of distilled water. On the following day, if purging has set in, 2 oz. of laudanum should be given in linseed tea, and, as soon as the purging has ceased, 1 lb. of Epsom salts and 1 oz. sulphate of iron should be given night and morning. If the animal is weak and refuses food, a quart of gruel per day, with an egg in it, may be given, the back rubbed with yeast (barm), and a mustard blister well rubbed in below the extremities of the ears and the tail."

The attendance of buyers at Messrs. Girdwood's August wool sales at Edinburgh was the largest ever known, upwards of 200 buyers were seen from the Yorkshire districts. It is said that nearly 18,000 bales were offered by the different brokers; 14,000 bales were sold on the first day. A fair clearance was effected in hoods, half-breds, crosses, and Cheviots. For Southdowns there was but little demand. The quality of the whole combing wools realised satisfactory prices, but not equal to what was obtained at the end of June. Laid Cheviots have fetched good prices, best principally for private at the rates of 1s. to 1s. 2d. Laid mixed wools the market, which has been rather drooping of late, closed firm. The highest fair laid Cheviot was sold for 1s. 2d. Combing and combing Bunions Ayes made 1s. 8½d., and the highest price reached was 2s. 3d. for two bales of the Rev. Mr. Cockburn's wool from Berwickshire.

There were about 25,000 head of lambs at Lockerby Lamb Fair, against 28,000 last year. 42s. was paid for a hundred half-breds from Whitestanhope, long 5s. 6d. more than last year. A pen of ewes from Cheviot wolder lambs from Burnhill made 26s. At the Melrose Lammas Fair from 60,000 to 70,000 sheep were yielded; but the good prices in the morning fell considerably, and many were left unsold. Mr. Oliver, of Hawick, put up 9000 lambs on the Saturday after, and his own half-bred ewe lambs made 30s. Mr. Scott, of Bowden, the Border type at Beattock on Sept. 14. There will be about 150 of them from shearlings to aged ewes.

There is no especial shorthorn news, except that Mr. Thomas Booth's fine Talisman, the last drop of Bates's blood, was shot at Mr. Mitchell's, of Alton, not by ringdroyal or any other disease, but fairly worn out. Very few of the new shorthorn pedigrees of late were about from the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland's show at Clonmel; and a run of Sir Colin was the all first-prize bull. The Lamp of Lothian blood also came out well at the bulls' Richards, which is quite the Irish "Rosetta," was head of the cow class; and so was Woodhelm, another of the late Captain Bates's breeding in the two-year-old class. The Shrops were remarkably good; and, although the Hereford breed has been recently much introduced, twenty shearling tups were shown. There seems no doubt that it is there destined to become the sheep of Ireland. There was only a small class of Herefords and Devons. In a sweep stakes a gem of a Hereford bull calf, by the celebrated cow, and bred by Mr. G. M. Kearsey, whose bull and cow were both sent by Mr. Feathers tonhaugh from Herefordshire to the show, and at the cattle plague kept them away, Mr. Duckham's celebrated cow Carlisle has made him her stall, as she has taken every first prize at one of the Smithfield gold medal on of 1863. When he bought her, at Lord Berwick's first sale, he was told that she would not breed, but he ran the risk and the renowned cow has proved a rare breeder. The veteran Mr. Monkhouse has not been so lucky in his speculative purchase from Sargeant, Bella, the first cow at Oxford, is now barren and general debility could never be got over, and size has gone the way of all flesh. Mr. Philip Turner, of Sleaford, has sold the well-known prize-bull Chieftain the Second from Mr. Hollings as he likes his prize scale. In the Lincolnshire Wolds generally the Herefordshire harvest—as it is, in fact, everywhere else. The corn is very good on the heavy soils, but there is only a moderate outlook with roots. Those who travelled from this white-and-mottle-faces county to the Irish Show, describe the roots as "horribly bad from Ross to Holyhead, and again from Dublin to Clonmel." Mr. James Menzies, the well-known Devon breeder, and the winner of short sixty prizes at the Royal Agricultural Society and elsewhere, retires from business, and is going to sell his entire herd of sixty-one, of which thirty-two are females, seven males, and the rest young steers, at Brinsworthy, near North Molton, on Sept. 8. The well-bred pure-bred Exmoor sheep form the flock, of which 160 are store ewes.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Aug. 11.—To-day's market was but moderately supplied with both British and foreign grain, and the trade was very dull at Monday's quotations. Good dry samples of wheat sold steadily, at full quotations; but other kinds were disposed of at barely previous rates. Barley was in limited supply, and fully as dear as on Monday last. Malting qualities were in good demand. Beans and peas were unaltered in value. Oats moved off rather slowly. Malt was quite as dear as last week, with a fair demand.

Wheat—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d. to 7½d. per 8lb. loaf.

Oats—Potato, 20s. to 22s.; Scotch feed, 21s. to 23s.; Scotch feed, 24s. to 25s.; Scotch potato, 25s. to 26s.

English Grass Seed Last Week.—Wheat, 43,742 bushels; 322 sacks; 226 quarters.

Irish Grass Seed Last Week.—Wheat, 11,567 bushels; 1,000 sacks; 1,000 barrels; 1,000 barrels; 1,000 barrels.

Liverpool.—There is more business passing in raw qualities, at quite last week's quotations. Flour is dull, at 24s. to 25s. per barrel. Indian corn is steady, at 32s. per quarter; flour, 20s. to 21s. per barrel. Oatmeal is steady, at barely stationary prices.

Hull.—There is a fair demand for grain for sale, and the quotations have a drooping tendency. Flour is dull, at 24s. to 25s. per barrel.

Hull.—Imports are very large, and prices, generally, are well supported. Stock, 20,110 quarters. Flour is dull, at 24s. to 25s.

Provisions.—There is a steady business doing in nearly all kinds of butter, at full prices. Bacon is in moderate request, at 56s. to 58s. for Waterford, and 60s. to 62s. for Limerick. Hams are in good demand, at 70s. to 72s. per cwt. Lard is dull, at 56s. to 58s.

Tallow.—The market is firm, and P.Y.C., on the spot, is selling at 41s. 6d. per cwt. Town Tallow, 40s. 6d. to 41s. Rough fat, 2s. 4d. per 8lb. Soap, 36s. to 38s.

Oils.—Linseed oil, 29s. 6d. per cwt. Rape, pale, 42s. 6d.; brown, 41s. Cocoa-nut oil, 42s. 6d. for foreign refined. In value of other oils very little change has taken place.

Spirits.—Rum, 1s. 10d. per gallon.

Seeds.—Cloverseed, 40s. to 60s. per cwt. Linseed, 40s. to 44s. Canary, 50s. per quarter. Brown is held on former rates. British rape is selling at 44, 10s. per pipe.

Wool.—The imports of new hops in good condition have been disposed of, at from 80s. to 110s. per cwt.; new duties, £2 10s. to £3; pockets, £3 5s. to £3 10s.; new Sussex, £3 10s. to £4; new Kents, £3 to £4 10s.; new Mids, £3 10s. to £5; and new, £3 5s. to £7 10s. per cwt.

Potatoes.—Kidneys, 70s. to 80s.; Regents, 80s. to 90s.; Shaws, 60s. to 70s.; Yorks, 70s. to 80s.; Scotch, 80s. to 90s.; Jerseys, 90s. to 100s.; Cork Reds, 60s. to 70s.; Whites, 70s. to 80s. per ton.
